Forrest Gregg is shooting for a strong start.

Operation: Getaway

By LEE REMMEL
Editorial Director

Chances are Satchel Paige never played football in his life.

But the late and legendary pitcher-philosopher had some good advice for those who do.

"Never look back," he once admonished, coining an aphorism which has gained considerable currency. "Somebody might be gaining on you."

Sound counsel, to be sure. But the Green Bay Packers, it can be said without reservation, would like to be in that position for a change.

For more years than they care to count, they have been pursuers rather than the pursued, not having captured an NFC Central Division championship since 1972.

All of which may explain Head Coach Forrest Gregg's jocular but significant reply to a routine question during a Milwaukee appearance before the media in early May.

"Any predictions for a strong finish?" was the innocuous query from the audience, posed to the Hall of Famer after he had concluded his formal remarks and opened himself up to interrogation from a capacity gathering of media types, members of Sudsville's Pen & Mike Club.

"How about," Gregg good-naturedly shot back, "a strong start?"

It was, admittedly, a spontaneous, off-the-cuff reply. But it clearly underscored the Packer coach's all-out approach to the 1987 season, one which should find this year's team better prepared to break from the barrier with dispatch than any other in the organization's long history.

The major element has been an extensive and voluntary off-season training program - the first of its kind in Packer annals - involving virtually every player on the roster. Launched in mid-April, it continued through May - on the field and in the classroom - and then resumed for a final, two-week, pre-training camp span in July.

Gregg himself has not given this historic regimen an official name. But he would not consider "Operation: Getaway" inappropriate, given the depth of his commitment to a fast start in '87.

The program was born of necessity, he said, shortly after the 1986 season ended, a 4-and-12 season in which the "Man from Birthright" admitted he had literally torn down his largely veteran team "to the bare walls" and rebuilt it in the wake of two consecutive 8-and-8 seasons and a disquieting impression of complacency among the squad's elders.

"What has happened to us every year," he began, "is we've just had a terrible first half of the season ... That's been the case in the three years that we've been here.

"Now, everywhere else I've been (he was head coach at Cleveland 1975-77 and at Cincinnati 1980-83), at least we had enough players in during the off-season to get some work done - particularly the quarterbacks and the receivers, and that type of thing.

"Here we didn't do that. We didn't have that many people here. Last year, we tried that deal with the offensive linemen (14 free agent offensive linemen were brought in for extensive early off-season work) and that worked out tremendously."

(Gregg didn't mention it but two of those free agents, Alan Veingrad and Tom Neville, subsequently became starters and effective protectors for quarterback Randy Wright).

"So this year," the Packer coach continued, "we're looking for some way to try to get this going for our football team early in the year instead of waiting until half the season's over before we're playing football.

"That's what the early program has been designed for."

Strong starts, it was noted, had been major factors in Gregg's success at Cincinnati when he led the Bengals to Super Bowl XVI in 1981 and a second successive playoff berth in 1982.

"I'll tell you what - they're a big factor in everybody's success," Gregg asserted. "Very seldom does a team start as slow as we have the last three years and overcome anything.

"If you'll remember, the first year (1984) we were 7-and-1 the second half of the season and 1-and-7 the first half.

"In the second season, it was basically the same thing (3-5 and 5-3). And then last year, we had a terribly slow start (0-6) because we had so many new players and because we got so many injuries ... It was just a very, very tough proposition overcoming that bad start."

Gregg's Thoughts-

"I am very excited about this coming season.

I think the Green Bay Packers have something to prove."

The off-season program, only a consideration earlier, became an imperative.

"I thought about it last year," Gregg informed, "when I realized we needed to do something.

"The other thing is when I started counting heads of people who were in Green Bay this off-season, and found we had only three players staying around, I knew we had to do something. It wasn't a situation of thinking about it, it was a situation of having to act, because it was just critical that we get people here and get them to working."

An accompanying factor, Gregg acknowledged, was the team's youth.

"Absolutely, that figured in the decision," he said. "When you have young ball players, every minute - every extra minute - that you can spend with them, the better off you are."

The results have been gratifying and, Gregg is convinced, bode well for an upsurge in '87.

"I think when you judge that program, two things tell you whether you're accomplishing what you want," the big Texan observed. "One is the attitude of the players ... It's also the reflection of the coaches, who are coaching the positions. And they relate to you the information that the players give to them.

"And I think, from both sides, that this thing was accepted extremely well. I think that the fact that we only had, really, three veterans that were eligible to come that didn't come - I think that pretty much shows you that we accomplished what we wanted to accomplish."

So satisfied was Gregg, in fact, that he could find no negatives.

"I found none whatsoever," he declared, repeating for emphasis, "none whatsoever.

"I've never been one to compensate a person for doing something that he should do on his own," (each player was paid $50 per workout day), he elaborated, "but this is happening in the league ... It's not just Green Bay that's doing it. Other people have been doing it for several years. So what we're doing is we're trying to do two things. We have a distinct disadvantage here because we didn't have that many players staying here in the off-season, so we had to do something to stimulate the players, and try to get them to come back to Green Bay.

"I think everybody that came profited from it - I think some people probably more than others. Probably the young offensive linemen, defensive linemen, linebackers, the wide receivers - all the young people ... the young quarterbacks, too.

"There's not any way in the world that you could assess the value of what they got in that program," Gregg appended with fervor.

"And from what I've seen out of those draft choices, I see potential starters for this year and I see, certainly, several of those people are going to make our football team.

"In the case of the veterans, it really helped to have them here from a morale standpoint. We also have made some changes in our systems, both offensively and defensively, and we have been able to make them aware of the changes ... It should give us a real boost."

Individual and collective improvement was not the only benefit derived. The program also has been a unifying factor, the Packer coach feels.

"It will just further assist us in what we're trying to do here," he said. "The players will know each other from the outset because of it. And they got to know each other from working together - working in the weight room, that type of thing; spending time together in off-hours, which is also a positive thing because you sort of have 'em all together.

"It also helps in conditioning. We have an off-season training program, a running program, a conditioning program. And what we've had here, in some cases, like for example Ed Berry and Sylvester Byrd, who were here the entire time. In both of them, you could just see the difference in them from when they came here, in their conditioning ... and the knowledge of what is expected of them, you're getting that daily routine of practice under the supervision of the guy who put the program together.

"Some people can go out and you can give 'em a program and they'll do that thing conscientiously, exactly the way it's supposed to be done, and not shirk one area of it. There are other players who just don't have the self-motivation or self-discipline to go out and do those things ... so those people probably benefited from the off-season program more than anybody else."

This last is just another reason why the Packers' imposing headmaster is openly optimistic about the prospects for success with "Operation: Getaway."

"I'm very excited about this coming season," he announced with characteristic energy during that Milwaukee media appearance. "I'm excited about it from several standpoints.

"One is I think the Green Bay Packers have something to prove ... We took a lot of shellacking last season off the field ... Those things we can't control. What we did on the football field I do not apologize for.

"Another reason I'm excited is that this team improved as the year wore on ... So we make no apologies for that. We knew, with young and inexperienced players, you're going to make mistakes. In first-year players, those mistakes you forgive ... That time is over.

"I'm also excited because, in our last game of the season against the New York Giants - against the greatest defense in the National Football League, that young man (quarterback Randy Wright) stood back there and took our team down the field and scored, and scored, and scored again.

"That's why I'm excited about 1987.

"All I ask is for us to have a chance to show you once again that the Green Bay Packers deserve and will earn the support of Packer fans here in Wisconsin and all over the United States."

And they would be happy, Gregg can assure, to be looking back over their shoulders while doing just that.

Quarterback Randy Wright completed 263 passes for 3,247 yards in 1986. Above, he sets to throw against the Chicago Bears in Green Bay. Note the good protection from Ken Ruettgers (75) and Mark Cannon.

SPECIAL DELIVERY

Randy Wright Arrives At Quarterback

By GARY VAN SICKLE
Milwaukee Journal

A quarterback is not like a piece of express mail. He doesn't arrive overnight. It usually takes some time before he delivers.

That, of course, explains the Green Bay Packers' quarterback situation in 1986. At one point, you could count the candidates for the Packers' starting quarterback job on one hand, but you needed your whole hand. There were five of them, enough to field a basketball team or have a tag-team wrestling match with one referee or play a hand of euchre while the fifth fellow watched from the front roooow.

Yes, it was murky and muddled and a bit confusing for a while in 1986. But by the end of the season, it was as clear and simple as counting to one. All you had to know was Randy Wright.

Sure, he took some licks. Any good envelope does. But he finally arrived with the stamp of a National Football League starting quarterback. His passing arm had enough zip. And after a rocky start, he and the Packers enjoyed some first class moments.

It wasn't a successful season for the Packers. There were three times as many losses as victories, but 1986 was the year the Packers found out they could count on Wright as their quarterback. It was the year he found out he could count on himself.

So pardon Wright for chuckling when Coach Forrest Gregg says Wright was the Packers' most improved player last season.

"I had the biggest chance to improve," he says, "because I started out at the bottom."

The starting quarterback job wasn't addressed to Lynn Dickey or Jim Zorn or Vince Ferragamo or rookie Robbie Bosco. It was addressed to Randy Wright, occupant.

If he had nowhere to go but up, at least he did. The state's media selected him as the team's most valuable offensive player. And why not? He passed for 3,247 yards, the third-highest total in Packer history. He passed for 17 touchdowns, fifth highest, and his 30 completions against San Francisco were the second-best single-game performance by a Packer quarterback.

settled what had been an unsettled, and unsettling, position. Especially early last season.

"When we started the season, a lot of young people were starting for us and a lot of them questioned in their own mind, 'Am I ready? " Gregg says. "They did not know the ability of Randy Wright - What is he going to do, how will he come along?'

"They grew together and got more confidence in themselves. At the same time, you could see Randy Wright gaining confidence in his own abilities and that spilled over to the other players."

The players' confidence in Wright, who was cast in the starting role mainly because the Packers didn't happen to have anybody else better at the time, grew at the same pace that Wright's confidence in himself grew. And that was oh-so-slowly at times.

"The biggest factor in order to get confidence in yourself is you have to go out and prove it," said Wright, a former star at the University of Wisconsin.

As you may vividly recall, something to base confidence on early last season was no more scarce than, say, a bottle of vintage wine at a tailgate party.

Wright completed just 10 passes in an embarrassing season opening loss to the Houston Oilers, a team that eventually found even mediocrity out of its reach. He threw five interceptions the next week in another blowout loss in New Orleans. He was tackled for a safety in a respectable loss to the Chicago Bears in a Monday night game, and then fell on his face, literally. Against the Vikings in Minneapolis, while trying to play despite an illness, Wright passed out in the huddle.

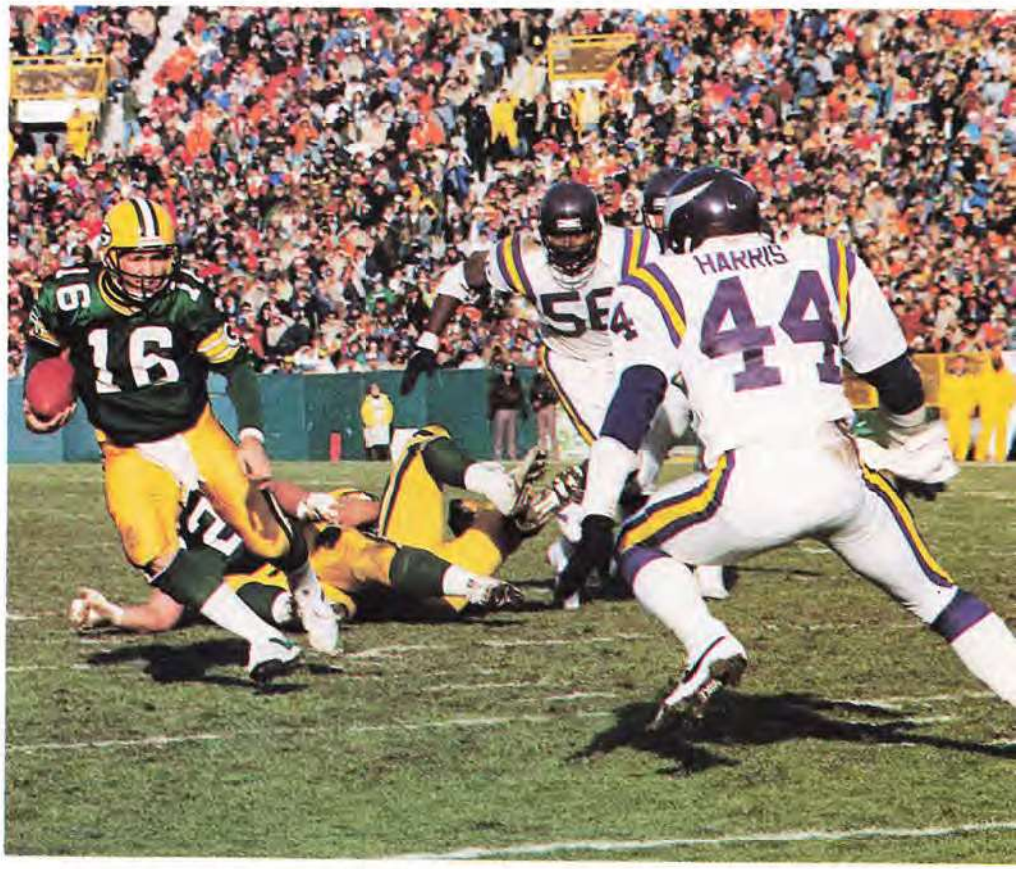
The Packers, and their new starting quarterback, had hit bottom. It was right about then that the Randy Wright Reclamation Project began to take shape. In fact, Phase One had already started in that loss to the Bears.

"We were 0-2 and I had just thrown five interceptions, and they were the world champions on Monday Night Football," Wright said. "I didn't play badly. That was the first game I started to see and get the feel of our receivers. I started to take more of what the defense gave us rather than try to force things.

"There was one play, I remember avoiding a tackle and scrambling in the pocket and looking for Gerry Ellis, the third receiver, and he picked up 15 or 16 yards.

"Statistically, I had a good game. I told myself, 'If you can play like that against the world champions in the third game, things will work out.' "

Randy also can run, as he deomonstrates here vs. Vikings.



Phase Two came two weeks later against the Cincinnati Bengals in Milwaukee. Forget the Vikings game. Wright does. It's easy to forget what you can't remember in the first place.

Against the Bengals, Wright had a bad first half, completing just 3 of 11 passes. The heat was on. The team was 0-4 and obviously struggling. The Packers were publicly looking at a trade for ex-Purdue star Jim Everett and at former Boston College quarterback Doug Flutie.

"At halftime, Forrest told me, 'Just forget about everything and throw the ball the way you are capable of and relax and enjoy it, '" Wright said. "I completed 17 of 22 passes in the second half. It was the best half of football I had played.

"That was the first game I really started stepping up in the pocket."

Still, the Packers' second-half comeback fell short, and they lost, 34-28. At least they showed signs of a pulse, however.

Phase Three, and no doubt the biggest step, came two weeks later in Cleveland when the Packers, 0-6, startled the Browns for a 17-14 victory.

"That's when it started, and people started believing in what I could do," Wright said. "That was a game when things fit into place. I played well against a good team.

"I got a good feeling from that game. That was a darn good football team we beat. And we were one of the weaker teams last season, so it meant that much more."

The big play came in the third quarter when Wright hit Phillip Epps for a 47-yard touchdown play to put the Packers ahead to stay. Wright completed 21 of 27 passes for 276 yards and two touchdowns.

Phase Four of Wright's development came against the San Francisco 49ers the following week. The Packers played the 49ers, a play-off team, just about even until the fourth quarter. That's when Wright had two passes intercepted and returned for touchdowns, one of them by all-pro safety Ronnie Lott.

"It was maybe the most beneficial game all season," Wright said. "I made some key mistakes, but learning from those helped me the rest of the year.

"I talked to Ronnie Lott after that game. He said I was looking back at the receiver before I threw to him on certain passes. That was probably true at that point. I worked on that the rest of the season."

The difference in Wright's performance was easily noticeable. In the season's first four games, his quarterback rating (a complicated system derived from various passing statistics) was an abysmal 35. In those next four games, his rating was 99, which is outstanding.

The turning point had been the week after that dreadful Vikings game.

"They had just let Vince Ferragamo go and brought in Chuck Fusina," Wright said, "and with all the talk about Everett and Flutie, you don't know how much longer you're going to be playing. For all I knew, they were going to bring Everett in the next week. You try to force things and do it all in one play or one week, and you just can't do it."

That week George Sefcik, the Packers' quarterback coach, called Wright into his office. "George told me, 'Even if something happens, you'll be playing the next two or three weeks,' " Wright said. 'Just relax and play the way you can.'

"And that's when I started playing well the rest of the year."

You can look it up. But you don't have to. Wright's quarterback rating for the last 12 games of the season was 76. That would have ranked him 12th in the NFL for the season. For the sake of comparison, New York Giants' quarterback Phil Simms had a regular-season rating of 74.6.

Wright's improvement solidified his role at quarterback, and began to solidify his role as a leader in the huddle.

In the next-to-last game of the season, after Walter Stanley dropped two passes, Wright told him that if he dropped another pass, he wouldn't throw to him ever again. Stanley made a great catch the next play.

"The last four or five games, I started getting on people," Wright said. "I was more vocal. There was a lack of concentration at times."

"I got a positive reaction from that. It helped our leadership."

It was something he couldn't have done at the start of the season. Sure, he was beginning his third season with the Packers. But he was still an unknown quantity.

"I hadn't earned their respect then," Wright said. "It helps you get respect if you come through adversity and rise above it, and everybody saw me do it last season.

"A lot of guys said they admired the way I grew during the season or said, 'The first two or three games, I wasn't sure you could handle it, but now I think you'll be here 10 years.' "

Wright starting at quarterback wasn't the only unsettling factor on the offense at the start of the year. A number of veterans were gone, a number of new starters took their place, and there was a new offensive system installed.

"I feel very good about our offensive system," Gregg said. "It takes a particular type of quarterback to know that system. I think that guy has developed in Randy Wright. He has a great deal of confidence in the system, and he knows what he can do with the offense.

"I think it was a matter of the players starting to say, 'Hey, this guy is a good quarterback. He can win for us.' That did a lot to pull the whole team together."

Wright also developed as a coach, too. OK, so it was only eighth-grade touch football, but undefeated is undefeated. Wright coached his parish team, the Holy Family Comets, to a 13-0-1 record and the league championship in his spare time last fall.

Wright got the job the year before when he noticed in his church bulletin that the team needed a coach.

"I played football in seventh grade, and I know how much I enjoyed it," Wright said. "So instead of cancelling the season, a neighbor and I coached the team."

Their games were played on Tuesday, the Packer players' day off, and moved back an hour on Thursday nights so Wright could make it after practice. That first year, Wright's team had only seventh - graders in an all eighth-grade league. They managed a 5-7 record. With that year's experience, they came back and dominated the league last season.

"It was fun, and the kids appreciated it," Wright said. "Those kids didn't have the concept of team football at first. Once they got out here, and saw how it worked, they did.

"It's a cliche, but it keeps them out of trouble and teaches them something. It teaches them that success isn't the most important thing, although it's a goal.

"At my level, success is the most important thing. That's my job."

And it's a job that Wright was able to start delivering on in 1986.

TRIO TURNS DEFENSE AROUND

by JIM EGLE
Green Bay Press-Gazette

At first, the insertion of safeties Ken Stills and Tiger Greene and linebacker Tim Harris into the Green Bay Packers' starting lineup bore the look of a cosmetic alteration.

The Packers, slow out of the gate in 1986, were 0-6 after six weeks. Head Coach Forrest Gregg, striving to shore up a defense which had yielded nearly 30 points per game in those first outings, named Stills, Greene and Harris as starters.

Losing teams frequently make such maneuvers. But no one could have foreseen that the unproven trio would work out so well.

The lineup changes paid off immediately with a victory over the Cleveland Browns October 26. More important, over the long term, Stills, Greene and Harris helped instill a more aggressive attitude in what had been a blase Packers' defense.

"Usually, you throw a guy into the lineup in the middle of the year and you wait to see how he'll react," said Defensive Coordinator Dick Modzelewski. "They took the challenge damn well.

"Those are the kind of people you're going to win with. I think they did a good job."

One measure of the impact of Harris, Greene and Stills comes from the Packers' defensive statistics.

In the first six games, the Packers' defense yielded an average of 343.2 yards and 29.5 points a game. Over the last 10 games, with Stills, Greene and Harris in the lineup, those averages dropped to 295.6 yards and 24.1 points a game.

Harris provided the team's only consistent pass rush and led the Packers in sacks with eight. Stills was second on the team in tackles.

Intangibles were also part of their contribution.

"I think our defense ... was floundering," Gregg said. "I think that those three people did a great deal to turn our defense around.

"I put a lot of intensity into the ballgame. And that's how the game is to be played, especially on defense."

The Packers' 21-14 loss to the Detroit Lions October 19 was perhaps the low point of the Packers' season. The Lions' game plan wasn't subtle; they rushed 52 times for 236 yards. It was the worst performance against the run by a Packer team coached by Gregg.

The play most symbolic of the defense's early-season play was a 31-yard touchdown run by the Lions' Garry James. He simply ran up the middle, shook off tackles by Packers' safeties Tom Flynn and John Sullivan and made his way to the end zone.

On the Packers' next series, Stills replaced Flynn at free safety. The other two changes - Harris for left linebacker Jeff Schuh and Greene for strong safety Sullivan - were made after the Lions' game.

"After the game was over, he (Gregg) said, 'You guys are going to be my starters next week,' " said Stills.

Said Harris of the lineup change: "We all got excited about it. It was easier to get into it."

Modzelewski points out that two key injuries earlier in the season led to the insertion of Harris and Greene. Harris took the spot normally occupied by John Anderson, who broke an ankle in Minnesota on September 28th. Greene's spot had been occupied by Mossy Cade at the start of the season, but Cade moved to cornerback when Tim Lewis' career was ended by a neck injury.

The key move, however, might have been replacing Flynn with Stills. Cut by the Packers as a rookie in '85 and re-signed later that season, Stills had already developed a reputation for aggressiveness.

His "surprise" hit on the Chicago Bears' Matt Suhey in a November 1985 game at Lambeau Field gained considerable attention. So did his boast before the September 22 game against the Bears last season. Stills said he planned a bruising "welcome" for Bears' quarterback Jim McMahon. McMahon didn't play; Stills played little.

But placed in the starting lineup, Stills let his actions do the talking. The long, thin towel he wore in his back pocket became one trademark of Stills. So did frequent thunderous hits on opposing ball carriers and wide receivers.

"I think Kenny Stills, with the way he played aggressively, he picked up the whole defense, especially the defensive backs," Modzelewski said. "He set the whole thing in motion as far as knocking the hell out of people."

Said Stills: "(Defensive end) Alphonso Carreker told me he felt like he was in college again. I had a great time in college (University of Wisconsin) and I wanted to carry it over to the NFL."

Stills' towel became emblematic of the '86 Packers defensive approach, the young team's general refusal to be pushed around by older, bigger teams.

Stills started the practice at Wisconsin and kept doing it in the pros. He simply thought the towel looked good.

Others in the secondary--Greene, Elbert Watts, Mark Lee--also began wearing towels. And others on the defense imitated Stills' habit of talking to opponents.

Both acts will be toned down this year, Stills said. The towels will be shorter and of uniform color. Talking to opponents is out.

"We're going to knock 'em down and help 'em up, knock 'em down and help 'em up," Stills said. "There won't be any noise or junk like last year. We're going to prove we can play to win and not do those other things."

Stills' off-field demeanor is quite different than the image he projects on the field. He is quiet, somewhat reclusive and independent. Stills attributes his self-reliance to his childhood. He was raised by his father, a career military man, and an older sister in Oceanside, California.

His on-field behavior is cocky and daring, but during his first two training camps Stills doubted whether he had the talent to play in the National Football League.

"You think they're all-world, all-stars," Stills said. "I was nervous out there.

"At free safety, I've got to make all the calls on defense and you've always got to be deeper than anyone else on the field. But once I played two or three games, I got comfortable out there."

Greene came to the Packers with little experience at safety. He had played cornerback at Western Carolina. He spent his rookie season, 1985, as a strong safety with the Atlanta Falcons, but was cut before the 1986 season started. When Lewis was hurt, the Packers signed Greene.

During his first few weeks with the Packers, Greene played nickel back. After the fiasco against the Lions, he found himself starting at strong safety.

"We talked among ourselves and said we're going to go out and play hard football, and maybe everybody else will catch on," Greene said. "That's what happened."

Like Stills, Greene felt he had to perform well immediately.

"I felt it was do-or-die for me," he said. "I was either going to make or break myself.

"If I went out there and played bad, I was gone. If I played well, I bought myself one more week."

Greene, too, is soft-spoken off the field. His on-field personality is not nearly as vocal as Stills.

But Greene has proven he is not a shy tackler, either. One of the staples of the Packers' 1986 highlight film is Greene's hit on the Lions' James during the teams' second game of 1986. James winds up facing the other goal line.

"It was like a challenge between him and Kenny Stills, who was going to hit them harder," Modzelewski said.

Said Greene: "He'd get a good lick and come back to the huddle and say, 'How about that?' I'd say, 'It's my turn now. I've got to top that to have something to talk about on Monday.'"

One area in which Stills and Greene did not shine was interceptions. Stills, the free safety, had just one interception in 10 games, returning 58 yards for a touchdown in the season finale against the eventual Super Bowl Champion Giants. Greene had two.

"I had a lot of difficulty," Stills said. "I hadn't worked on breaking on those long, long angles to the ball."

Modzelewski faults the Packers' pass rush in 1986 for those low numbers. The Packers, who sacked opposing quarterbacks 48 times in 1985, had just 28 sacks last year.

Harris is among the players Modzelewski is counting on to improve the Packers' pass rush. Harris spent most of the 1986 training camp trying to make the adjustment to linebacker. He had been a standup defensive end at Memphis State.

When the Packers put Harris in the lineup, they altered their defensive scheme to utilize his skills as a pass rusher. He played the left outside linebacker role in the 3-4 defense, then would drop down as the left defensive end in the 4-3 in passing situations. By the end of the season, he was playing so well he earned honors as the team's rookie of the year.

"In the last five games of the year, I think he did a great, great job," Modzelewski said. "And the thing I really like about him is that he would never stop.

"They throw a screen pass, and he comes from behind and makes the tackle. The quarterback runs to the right side, and he chases him down from his spot on the left side."

Harris' biggest adjustment was making pass drops. He said he feels more confident heading into the '87 season.

Opponents challenged Harris and his inexperience by running to the left side last year. For the most part, Harris held his own.

"I wanted them to come test me," Harris said. "I wanted them to run my way so I could make tackles."

With the return of Anderson, Harris will move to right outside linebacker this season. Modzelewski doesn't think the shift will cause Harris difficulty.

Harris was another of the vocal Packer defenders last year. He also thinks the act will be less noisy - but not by much. He can't see himself helping up a defender.

"I can't keep my mouth shut," Harris said. "If I keep my mouth shut, I'll get off on something else."

Packer coaches can only hope Stills, Greene and Harris continue to develop into "something else."

WALTER WANTS THE BALL

87 sees more success in '87

By BRIAN WHITE
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Walter Stanley, with Bruce McNorton on his heels, is about to gather in pass against the Lions.

The key to the surprising and sudden success of Walter Stanley may lie very simply in an extreme case of greed.

Stanley wants to handle the football. He wants it badly and he wants it all the time.

It is that attitude and the unshakeable confidence that goes with it that has thrust Stanley firmly into the Green Bay Packers' plans for the 1987 season. Almost an unknown a few years ago, the 5-foot-9 1/4 inch, 180-pound Stanley now is considered to be among the NFL's most dangerous players.

Last season, Stanley's second, was impressive. He finished fifth in the NFC in punt returns with a 9.6-yard average and ninth in kickoff returns with a 20.0-yard average. He had the NFC's highest average per catch with 20.7, a figure matched in the AFC only by Wesley Walker of the New York Jets.

But the numbers that reflect Stanley's season more clearly are his 1,617 all-purpose yards. That means he gained 17 yards every time he touched the ball.

Versatility is the catchword for Stanley.

"I love it and I definitely take pride in it," Stanley said. "I love returning kicks, I love returning punts and I especially love playing receiver. I think I'm the kind of guy who loves having the ball in his hands at any given time, especially when the game's on the line. I thrive off that.

"I don't mind playing in pressure situations when the game's on the line. I feel that makes and breaks your best ballplayers, and I feel I have the ability to be up there with the best."

The colorful and eloquent Stanley has superior athletic ability and a supreme confidence to match. Some may write off his firm belief in himself as cockiness, but Stanley calls it an aid.

"I think my confidence has everything to do with (success)," he said. "Me, I'm a Christian guy and I don't believe He gave me all the ability I have - the speed and the great quickness I have - for nothing.

"I think He gave it to me to put it to use, and that's what I do. You run into players that aren't that confident, and those are the players who fall by the wayside. I'm not saying you have to be a cocky player, but if you believe in yourself, don't be afraid to show it."

That was exactly the case last Thanksgiving in Stanley's finest moment as a pro. In the first start of his career, Stanley showed a national television audience flashes of brilliance. He caught four passes for 124 yards and two touchdowns, returned two punts for 113 yards and one touchdown and had three kickoff returns for 50 yards.

He saved the best for last, running back a punt 83 yards in the game's final minute to give the Packers a 44-40 victory.

The runback stunned nearly everybody. Perhaps the only person unfazed by the heroics was Stanley, who said he knew all along it would happen. It turns out that moments before, Stanley, who ignored orders to call a fair catch, turned to teammate Ken Stills on the Green Bay sideline and called the shot.

"Every word of that is true," Stanley said. "I told him, 'Don't worry about it. I'm going to run this one back. I can feel it!'

"I've always been able to feel such things. I've always been able to feel when I was ready to make things happen. I feel I'm the kind of player who can make anything happen at any time. That was just something I knew I was going to do."

Stanley always knew he would make it in the NFL, which is rather amazing considering the path he took. A highly-touted high school player in Chicago, he shunned Illinois to attend Colorado and led the Big Eight in all-purpose yardage as a sophomore. In 1983, however, he was suspended from the school for disciplinary reasons and transferred to Mesa College, an NAIA school in Grand Junction, Colorado.

At Mesa, it was ruled that Stanley was ineligible to play. He practiced with the team, however, and went into the 1985 draft as a question mark.

Still, although he hadn't played a football game since 1981, Stanley was a fourth-round selection by the Packers. Coach Forrest Gregg showed what high hopes he had for Stanley when he issued him number 87, the number worn by Hall of Famer Willie Davis.

Stanley said the Packers explained the significance of the number when they handed it over to him.

"I think that began to boost my confidence level," Stanley said. "It told me, 'Hey, they know about your ability.' They could have picked any other receiver number and given it to me, but there's something special about that number'."

Stanley said the long layoff from football might have made him a bit rusty, but that it didn't make a dent in his confidence.

"I think once you start doubting yourself, you've already lost the battle," he said. "That's very important. I've never had any doubts in myself or my ability or in my future as a football player. I've always felt things would work out for the best, and I just had to keep my mind focused on that. I never gave up on myself."

Stanley started slowly in his rookie year. He didn't catch a pass, but averaged 12.7 yards returning punts and 23.8 returning kickoffs.

Last season, he was the third wide receiver behind James Lofton and Phillip Epps. With Lofton now gone, Stanley is expected to be a primary target on offense.

Is there pressure replacing one of the game's greatest receivers? "Sure," Stanley says, "but it is welcome.

"I love it," he said. "I wouldn't trade it for the world."

He also said fans can expect great things from the Stanley-Epps combination.

"I think this will be a combination like you see when you look at Mark Clayton and Mark Duper," he said. "But when you look at a Phil Epps-Walter Stanley combination, you're looking at a little better combination than Mark Duper and Mark Clayton--and we're talking about an outstanding combination there. I think we're more explosive than Mark Duper and Mark Clayton."

Stanley's colorful personality goes right down to his nickname and his explanation of it. His teammates call him "All-State," a name he said he has carried since high school.

"What 'All-State' is saying is that it's just like the insurance company," Stanley said. "If something goes wrong with your property, your car or whatever, you don't have to worry about it because All-State will take care of you."

Stanley prides himself in not taking his athletic ability for granted. With that in mind, he spent the winter in Colorado putting himself through difficult workouts.

He is pushing himself with goals in mind.

"I see a couple of all-pro years (in the future)," he said. "I see hopefully a couple of records out there for me to grasp. I see nothing but positive things to come from Walter Stanley."

Stanley said he expects the Packers to surprise a lot of teams this season, and he expects to be a key to the surprise. He said he needs to look no further than his jersey to figure that this is meant to be his biggest year yet.

"I look at my number 87 as a symbol meaning that 1987 is the year for Walter Stanley," he said. "...That's the way I hope to make it look. I definitely think that '87 is the exploding year for number 87."

The Private World of Forrest Gregg

"Some people like to play golf ... Others like to ride horses," Forrest Gregg observed while sitting down at lunchtime to his favorite dish, a bowl of steaming and spicy Texas-style chili. "Some people like to play cards.

"I like to fish."

Then proceeding to list his personal priorities in their proper order, the Packer coach added, "It's my favorite non-football pastime ... I love to fish."

The appeal?

"It's very relaxing for me. It's something I could just spend a great deal of time doing. And it's sort of a challenge in a way. But, on the other hand, it can be rewarding."

Pursuing the elusive bass may be a private passion for a highly public figure but it is by no means the only one.

The "private" Alvis Forrest Gregg - for that is his given name - also admits to being fond of country and western music, reading (preferably western novels), sawing wood, working in the yard and watching television.

And, though the big man's intimidating presence on the practice field or the sidelines of an NFL stadium might not suggest it, he also likes to laugh. Possessor of a robust sense of humor, he delights in employing the "put-on" with an unsuspecting victim, e. g., one of his coaches or players.

This predilection surfaced, in fact, as he facetiously set about identifying his "favorite" fishing companion.

"You always like to fish with somebody you can beat," he said, a twinkle in the eye, obviously intending his comment for other, neighboring ears. "So I take Forrest (his son) with me as much as I possibly can."

As might be expected, Alvis Forrest Gregg Jr., seated at an adjacent table in the Packer administration building's kitchen, took the bait. He quickly interposed with mild indignation, "It's not true."

His father chuckled heartily at the anticipated reaction and, nodding agreement, said, "I know it .... He waxes my ears down."

Win or lose, however, fishing clearly is the elder Gregg's primary diversion in leisure moments, when available.

"I really like all phases of it," he confesses. "I like to bass-fish probably as well as anything ... Probably, if I had my choice of the type of fishing I'd really do all the time, or constantly - that I don't have much time to do - it's fly-fish. I just don't have the time to pursue it."

Country and western music, as indicated, also looms large in his life.

"I've always been a Johnny Cash fan, and I still am," he admits. "I also like Willie Nelson ... I like a lot of 'em ... There are some new guys coming up I really like, too."

Although a Hall of Famer himself, and a legendary figure in Packer history, Gregg is not without heroes of his own - especially in the "country" field.

Getting to know Cash, he will tell you, was a memorable moment for him.

"I met Johnny Cash when I was a player here in Green Bay (in the 60's)," he said. "He came here for a couple of concerts and then one other time, we were playing in Milwaukee and he was in the lobby of the Pfister (Hotel, where the Packers headquarter in Milwaukee) so I went over to him and said 'hello' again.

"Meeting him was a big thrill."

Inevitably, for one who grew up with the C & W genre in the Dallas area (his Texas hometown of Birthright is 90 miles east of "Big D"), a number of songs have a special appeal for this proud and loyal alumnus of SMU.

"There are a lot of 'em that I like," Gregg acknowledges. "I like a lot of songs that Johnny Cash sang, like 'Folsom Prison' and 'I Walk The Line.' Gosh, there's any number of 'em. But I like Hank Williams, too. I'm a real fan of his - was a real fan of his. Because, you know, I was just a high school kid when he was most popular and you always reflect back to memories of those songs, and so forth."

Does his spouse, Barbara, share his enthusiasm for "country?"

"She tolerates it," Gregg replied. "She likes country music okay. She probably doesn't like it as well as I do ... Not many people do."

And his offspring?

"Forrest (Jr.) likes it pretty good. Karen (now Mrs. Robert Bernard Gray II of Dallas) can take it or leave it," he said dryly, "mostly leave it.

"Usually when Karen and I are together, it's a cultural exchange," he confided, tongue slightly in cheek. "She compromises. She says, 'If you won't make me listen to the country western all the time when we're in the car playing the radio, I won't make you listen to my music."

What kind is that?

"Oh, I don't know. What do the kids like? ... Probably rock. What she likes is ... Bruce Springsteen - that type."

In private moments, the towering Texan has been known to do a bit of singing himself, dating back to his playing days when he and teammates Gale Gillingham and Ken Bowman would soulfully harmonize on such ditties as "Please Release Me" while the team bus rumbled back to Green Bay from Milwaukee.

"Yes, we used to sing in the back of the bus," Gregg affirmed, chuckling at the memory of those now distant sessions. "I haven't done that much lately.

"Mostly," he offered in explanation, "I haven't been around Bo and Gillie."

There is yet another side to the Packer coach - in the area of domesticity. A self-confessed do-it-yourselfer and homebody, he took a major role in designing the home southwest of Green Bay that he and Barbara share.

Playing down his part in this project, Forrest informed, "I sort of got the idea... I found a sort of basic plan that I liked. I knew what I wanted in a house because of the contour of the land. Where the lot was, I knew what kind of house I wanted. So I found the plan that was similar to what I was looking for. Then, with the help of the builder, I told him what I wanted and he sort of put things together. Then we would throw it around and we just wound up building what we felt like we liked ... I like openness and I love glass. Both of those are available in our house."

Away from the office and the practice field, it obviously is the center of his private universe.

"I enjoy being at home" he says. "That's relaxation. I enjoy watching TV and I enjoy reading ... I love to work in the yard. And if the lawn mower hadn't broken down, and I didn't have a good guy to mow my lawn, I'd still enjoy doing that. But I've got somebody that does it real well and he's sort of become a friend of mine, so I let him do it and I haven't bought a new lawn mower.

"But I like working in the yard, I like that type of thing - I like being outside. In the fall, when the leaves start to fall, I'll rake leaves. And, also, I've got a chain saw and I like to cut wood. When I used to cut wood as a kid (he was one of 11 children in the family of Boyd and Josephine Gregg), I didn't have the benefit of a chain saw and did it a lot with a crosscut. I did it then out of necessity. I do it now sort of to ease my mind.

"The one thing that I guess that I won't give up, as a public figure, is my right to choose my friends; my right to support what causes I feel that I want to support. And, sometimes by doing that, I irritate people, but I reserve the right to express my opinion. I don't necessarily try to influence anyone else. But, at the same time, if somebody asks me, I'll tell 'em.

"And I cherish loyalty, in the people that work with me and work for me. And if I get that from them, to me it's reciprocal. I give it back in kind ... And that's important to me."

So, understandably, are those rare moments of relaxation during the hectic pace of the regular season, snatched whenever the opportunity presents itself.

A devout homebody, Forrest Gregg enjoys working in his yard during leisure hours of releaxing on the deck of his home (above) with his wife, Barbara.

"Barbara likes to work in the yard, too, so we work together. And we like to walk. We live in an area out of town where there are a lot of trees and there's not a great deal of traffic so we're able to walk."

At other times, he says, "I like to read. I read westerns ... books, novels. I like Louis L'Amour real well. I read all of his books. I guess I've read every book he's ever written ... As far as I know, I have. If there's another one, I don't know about it."

As might be expected of a public figure who receives media exposure almost daily the year around the Packer coach concedes, "I like my privacy ... (But) it's not a requirement that I be alone all the time ... I like people. I'm not a hermit, I'm not a loner - not a loner at all. And I say I have an interest in what's going on in the world - and not just my world.

"I read mostly, then," Gregg says. "On the plane - I usually read on the plane when we're playing on the road. Watch television, watch a movie or something otherwise, in the hotel or when I'm at home."

He can truly relax at those times?

"Oh, yeah ... Usually, I sleep well. There were a few times last year when I didn't. But most of the time, I can leave it here (at the office) ... Most of the time I can.

"That's not to say it won't creep in on you if you're in a critical situation. You know, last year there were several times during that year that, as hard as you tried, you couldn't put it down ... Most of the time I can."

But not as easily - he would be the first to admit - as he could on a remote and placid lake, with fishing rod in hand and a pail full of bass in the boat.

The faithful are fired up as Packers battle Bears on "Monday Night Football."

TV Testimonial: Packer/Bear rivalry still magic

The Packer-Bear rivalry, a National Football League marquee attraction for more than 60 years, has lost none of its magic.

Impressive documentation of how any collision between the venerable enemies whets the collective appetite of football fans nationally was provided the night of September 22, 1986, when the Packers entertained the Midway Monsters in a "Monday Night Football" contest at Green Bay's Lambeau Field.

That meeting, which saw the Packers carry a 12-10 lead into the fourth quarter before falling to the defending Super Bowl champions (25-12), produced the highest television ratings of the season for the 16-week prime time series.

The A. C. Nielsen survey, TV's bible, gave it a strong 22.0 rating. Translation: 22 per cent of all TV households in the nation were tuned to the telecast, representing 19,230,000 homes and approximately 35 million viewers.

The late E. L. 'Curly' Lambeau and George Halas, who started it all back in 1921, would have been pleased.

Mark Lee: MAN OF STE(A)L

Steel, even in the supplest of forms, has a cool, often deceiving tensile strength.

It's that quality, wrought by the forge, that gives the metal durability.

The characteristics of steel are in the makeup of some men, too. One in particular is Mark Lee, cornerback for the Green Bay Packers.

Lee has taken on adversity in his seven years with the Packers and hasn't buckled. He snapped back from back surgery in 1985 to produce, in 1986, one of the finest seasons a Packer cornerback has ever had.

He pirated nine enemy passes, one short of the team interception record set by Irv Comp in 1943. He also accounted for 47 solo tackles, 14 assists, deflected two passes and recovered one fumble.

The statistics tell a convincing story. But Lee's season was more than just numbers.

"It wasn't a year where he caught nine errant balls ... ," says Dick Jauron, Packers' secondary coach. "Mark Lee did a lot of other things. He did a lot of things well last year and he had nine interceptions. He played consistently, and tackled consistently.

"And more important than all those things, he was a consistent leader for us."

But that kind of contribution from Number 22 wasn't exactly startling to Jauron. When he first met Lee after being hired by the Packers in January of 1986, Jauron noticed certain traits in the veteran corner. Here was a tough customer, thought Jauron, a former all-pro free safety with the Detroit Lions.

"You sort of look at a man's eyes and you can sort of tell some things from that. If you look at Mark Lee's eyes I think it's clear that you're dealing with a man here. He's somebody that does have some inner fortitude, that does have some sort of inner strength, and there's a steel inside of this man.

But there is still room for the boy inside the man. Lee and his teammate and friend, Tim Lewis, would often engage in the playfulness of youth.

The two had their own code on the field. They would chatter "double" back and forth across the field to each other deliberately trying to throw off the opposition's passing game.

The ploy worked on San Diego's Dan Fouts during a home game against the Chargers in 1984. Fouts heard Lee and Lewis chattering "double, double" as they eyed wide receiver Charlie Joiner at the line. Suckered, Fouts called a time out, to the hilarity of Lee and Lewis.

"We were two of the better cornerbacks, as a pair, in the league," says Lewis, who was forced to leave the game last season because of a neck injury. "There weren't very many teams that took us to the cleaners as far as pass routes were concerned and scoring touchdown passes."

Lewis was Lee's closest friend on the team and this loss cut deeply. But the unwritten, though keenly understood, code of the NFL stresses survival of the fittest.

Lee didn't try to fill the void in the secondary left by Lewis. He just tried to perform his own job the best he could.

"That (Lewis' loss) was in the back of my mind," says Lee. "Then again, that was the last year of my contract because I signed a one-year deal. I really thought I really had to perform and really show what I can do."

Lee has a competitive edge honed over most of his life. He was the last born into a family of 12 brothers and sisters (March 20, 1958).

"Competition started at the meal table," Lee said, who grew up in Hanford, California and now resides in Bellevue, Washington.

"All my brothers and sisters were pretty competitive in everything that they did. When I was growing up and going to high school there were records from way back in the 60's that my brother set in track. When I got there I broke several."

When Lee is reunited with his family they lavish him with praise for his athletic accomplishments. Somewhat shy, Lee is embarrassed by all the attention.

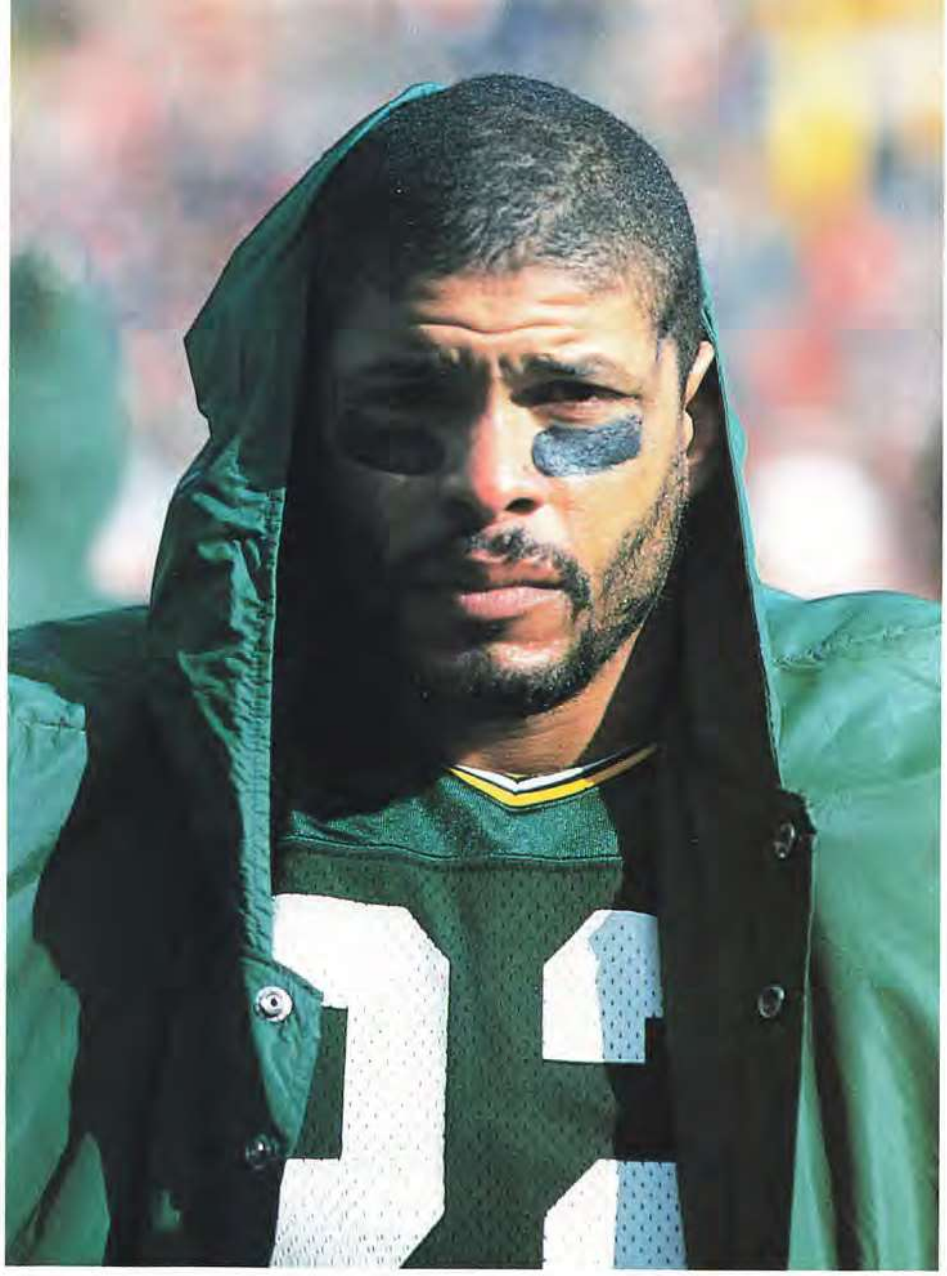
Not the flamboyant type, he sets his goals and quietly pursues them. His goal entering last season was simple and predictable.

"The attitude that I came in with was to be the best that I could be at my position," says Lee. "I wanted to be a leader because I knew that we cut a lot of veteran players. I wanted to establish a leader role."

He started the season with an interception in five of the first eight games. He was blanked the next three games, but came up with two against the Bears, November 23.

Lee appeared on the verge of breaking the Packers' single season interception record. He needed three but got one in the season finale against the Giants.

He ended the season tied with New Orleans' cornerback Dave Waymer and Kansas City safety Deron Cherry for the second best interception mark in the NFL. San Francisco's Ronnie Lott led the league with 10.



Now in his eighth season, Mark Lee is one of the top cornerbacks in the NFL.

"I think Mark may have had something to prove in that last year," says Lewis. "They went around and around with the contract figures and he was late to camp."

An outstanding season can also come back to haunt a cornerback the following season. Lee will have to guard against the marked-man syndrome that often afflicts successful corners. Once established as threats, opponents tend to avoid the top corner by throwing to the other side. Lewis' interceptions fell from seven in 1984 to four the following season.

A more dramatic drop was experienced by free safety Tom Flynn, who picked off nine in 1984 and barely recorded one in 1985.

"They didn't throw very much to my side the next year," says Lewis. "Once you develop a reputation for coming up with the big play they have a tendency to go away from you. You don't come up with the interceptions anymore and it's not necessarily that you're slacking off or having a worse season; it's just that they're not going at you as much."

Lee isn't dwelling on what the opponent might or might not do. "I try not to look at it that way, because although in 1986 I was having a good season they were still throwing my way," says Lee. "I'm always going to have to come in with the attitude to be the best that I can be and never slack up. I can't think, 'Well, OK I had a good season last year and they're not going to throw to my side.' I'll always have to expect that every time that man comes up to the line of scrimmage he's going to throw to my man."

Lewis suggests that the presence of Mossy Cade was extra incentive for Lee. "They had just brought in Mossy Cade and I think maybe the both of us were feeling the pressure of Mossy. Maybe he (Lee) felt he had something to prove there.

"I was a number one pick also and had had a good year the year before. Maybe he thought they were trying to tell one of us something. And I felt the same way - maybe they were trying to tell one of us something.

"He just went about his business just like he always does, very quiet, just getting the job done," says Lewis.

But there's more to Lee's makeup than mental toughness and intense competitiveness. He's big for a cornerback, 5-foot-11, 190 pounds. He has great quickness and the upper body strength to handle most wide receivers.

"In bump and run if he can get his hands on you he can get you off stride," says Lewis. "If you're a team that throws timing routes, he can throw that timing off.

"Fortunately, although he's big, he has the speed to run with the smaller, quicker receivers," says Lewis. "With that kind of combination of size and strength, along with the quickness and speed, you're going to be a great corner."

Lee covers his man tightly, denying the little separation that quarterbacks like to see. He rounds out his game by supporting the run well. "He'll come up and stick his head in when he has to and turn the play inside," says Lewis.

During the months between seasons Lee can often be found working with his brother and sister-in-law in a youth home in Berkeley, California. He contributes by giving motivational speeches to troubled youths.

The off-season also gave Lee time to sort out his feelings about a 1986 season worthy of all-pro mention and why he wasn't given that recognition.

Did it bother him not receiving the honor? "It did and it didn't," says Lee. "That's not in my control; I can't do anything about that.

"I kind of had it in the back of my mind that it was a long shot because we weren't a winning team. I didn't let it bug me during the season. I tried hard not to think about it."

"If there is any sort of disappointment, I would believe that Mark Lee would use it to his benefit," says Jauron. "He'll drive himself even harder to have a better year. And eventually he'll go to the Pro Bowl."

Knowing the resiliency of steel, there's a strong likelihood Mark Lee will snap back for another "all-pro" season in 1987.

Jauron hit on the reason why Lee excels in his profession. "You can get a lot of football players, but football players are not what you need - you need men that play football. Mark Lee is a man that plays football. And he plays it well."

Packers' Title Triumphs Erased Small Town Label

By ART DALEY
Editor Emeritus

The Packers were flying out to the first Super Bowl on this January day in 1967.

It was a new experience and Coach Vince Lombardi seemed happy with all the folks around him, including this correspondent for the local Green Bay paper.

For no particular reason, I suggested to Vince and some of his coaching cohorts: "The two teams (in this game) are sure from a couple of tank towns."

Lombardi let out a laugh but being a native of Brooklyn, New York, he wasn't quite sure what a tank town was ... exactly, that is. Obviously, Kansas City was an old cow town and not listed among the elite in the NFL like New York, Chicago and so on. Naturally, little old Green Bay was a thousand shades tankier.

Anybody over 50 back in 1967 (like Vince and this scribe) should have known what a tank town was. The exception was Vince, a big-city guy.

Always thirsting for knowledge, Lombardi was informed that a tank town was a small burg that had a big water tank along the railroad tracks. The big steam engine would stop there to load up on water. The engineer would grab that water spout and fill the engine water container.

That's also where the expression "jerk water town" hailed from. Sometimes you had to jerk that spout to make the water run.

Whatever Green Bay is, a tank town or a jerk water town (or a whistle stop?), the Packers have, of course, long since erased and/or ground under a lot of the corn that is associated with a small town.

Actually, they did it the hard way - they earned it by winning 11 NFL championships along the way, including the first two Super Bowls, and no team has matched that title total yet. Green Bay is a charter NFL'er and, yes, that puts a lot of white hair (they call it snow up in River City) on the Packer image.

It's also called tradition - stuff Green Bay is made of. Very often when a player is drafted by Green Bay, he usually refers to "the great tradition up there."

Winning all those titles means the Packers had to beat a lot of enemies along the way - and, conversely, lose a lot of games to the same enemies. Briefly, the Packers were winners in the 1920's, 1930's and most of the 1940's, losers in the 1950's, unbelievable winners in the 1960's, mostly losers in the 1970's and so-so, thus far in the 1980's.

Green Bay now has 27 opponents. That figure was reached with the arrival of Tampa Bay and Seattle in 1976 and 1977, respectively. Before the merger with the American Football League became a reality in 1970, the Packers had 15 opponents. Ten teams came over from the AFL, and Atlanta and New Orleans were added in the early 1970's.

Thus, the Packers have a lot of "problems" to contend with, but their biggest headaches are the four foes in the Central Division of the National Conference - Chicago Bears, Detroit Lions, Minnesota Vikings and Tampa Bay Buccaneers.

Those four teams are the number one adversaries because the Packers play each team twice - or eight games, half of the 16-game schedule. Also, to gain a playoff berth, the Pack would have to win the Central Division or place high enough to gain a Wild Card nod.

The Central Division was started in 1967 and it was known as the "Black and Blue Division" because the teams literally beat each other up with great defensive play. The Packers have no use for the Bears and Lions and when Bud Grant took over the Vikings they became a new hate. Being a new team in 1977, the Buccaneers were fairly soft, but they soon got mean and nasty like the rest of the Central teams.

The Packers have played 314 games against Central Division opponents but 246 of them have been against the Bears (133) and the Lions (113). The Packer-Bear series is the longest (and often the bitterest) rivalry in the NFL, dating back to 1921. The Packers are batting .492 vs. Central foes, with the Bears the chief culprits (.436).

The Packer-Bear series has taken on new meaning because the Chicagoans have become a powerhouse, having won the 1985 Super Bowl and reaching the playoffs in 1986. What's more, each team has accused the other of naughty play - very typical of the feeling between the two teams for decades.

The Vikings place a great amount of importance on beating Green Bay. Minnesota was all Packer-fan territory until the Vikings were born in 1961. The Viking fans "egg" the devil out of their team when the Packers play there. The two teams have played 51 games and the Pack has lost 26, a .480 percentage.

The Packers have done right well against the other National Conference teams - as a group, that is. They are batting .620 vs. the Philadelphia Eagles, St. Louis Cardinals, Dallas Cowboys, New York Giants and Washington Redskins of the Eastern Division and .503 vs. the New Orleans Saints, Atlanta Falcons, Los Angeles Rams and San Francisco 49ers of the Western Division. Green Bay is .529 vs. the NFC.

The American Conference has been the big bug. The major patsies have been Cleveland and Pittsburgh, two of three teams (Baltimore was the other) who came over to the AFC in the merger in the late 1960's. Green Bay is .592 vs. Pittsburgh and .615 vs. Cleveland but for the AFC as a unit the Pack is .487 .

To round out the schedule (after eight games vs. Central opponents), the Packers, each year, play four other teams in their own conference and four teams in the American Conference.

Each year the opponents from the AFC find the Packers a sort of fresh look. Last year the Pack played Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Houston and Cincinnati of the AFC's Central Division, beating only the Browns.

This year the Packers play four of the five teams in the AFC's Western Division. It's especially interesting because the Packers first two Super Bowl opponents are on the schedule - the Chiefs from one of the aforementioned tank towns and the Los Angeles Raiders, who played Green Bay in Super Bowl II as the Oakland Raiders. The other two foes are Denver and Seattle.

Ironically, the only two games the Packers won vs. Kansas City and the Raiders were the Super Bowl events. The Chiefs won one and tied one in the only other games. The Raiders won all four matches vs. Green Bay after Super Bowl II.

The Packers won Super Bowl I against the Chiefs 35-10 in the Los Angeles Coliseum January 15, 1967. The Packers were a 13-point favorite but the game was in doubt in the first half. Willie Wood's interception and return of 50 yards of a Len Dawson pass in the third quarter gave the Pack a 21-10 lead and broke the game open.

The Pack won Super Bowl II in the Orange Bowl January 14, 1968 in a landslide, with Don Chandler kicking four field goals and Herb Adderley sealing the 33-14 victory with a 60-yard interception return of a Daryle Lamonica pass for a TD.

This will be the first year the Packers will have played their first two Super Bowl opponents in the same year. There are few reminders now of those first two games, although Lamar Hunt still owns the Chiefs and Al Davis is still the head honcho of the Raiders. Forrest Gregg, now the Pack's head coach, played for Green Bay in both games as an all-pro offensive right tackle.

One of the games will be quite special. The Raiders will be guests for the Pack's home opener Sunday, September 13--always a significant event in Lambeau Field. The Packers play at Kansas City, November 22 - a city they have visited for regular season competition only once in 1977.

In fact, the Packers play all four AFC teams in back-to-back situations this year. After the Raiders, the Denver Broncos open the Pack's season in Milwaukee, September 20. Before the trip to Kansas City, the Packers play at Seattle.

Two of the Packers' more interesting rivalries have been with the NFC teams from the West Coast - the Rams and 49ers. The Rams lead the series 34-39-2 and so do the 49ers, 20-23-1. For years, back in the 1950's and 1960's, the Packers finished their season on the West Coast, playing both teams.

LA and SF had a picnic with the Pack until Lombardi came forth with a 10-5-2 record in the two cities. It's always tough traveling across a two-hour time zone and Packers coaches, including Lombardi, have agonized over the best time to leave - Thursday, Friday or Saturday. Most teams now just leave a day ahead of the game.

Well, now, let's examine the totals for the Packers against their 27 opponents - league and playoff games.

The official NFL Record and Fact Book lists the Packers playing their current opponents in a total of 753 games. Green Bay won 379, lost 346 and tied 28 for a percentage of .522. The Packers scored 14,231 points and allowed 13,507.

Quick now, what's the average score of the Pack's 753 games? Think. Answer: Green Bay 18.9, opponents 17.9. ONE point.

P.S.--The Packers played at least 25 other teams, including the old Milwaukee Badgers, who played in the early days of the NFL and then dropped out. The Packers defeated most of these teams handily, contributing to their longevity.

Led by Defensive Captain Willie Davis, the Packers run into Miami's Orange Bowl before Super Bowl II against the Oakland Raiders.

Capt. Hallstrom provides a massive and mobile escort for Kenneth Davis.

Captain Hallstrom's a Trooper

By ROB SCHULTZ
Madison Capital Times

Ron Hallstrom tried to sound serious as he offered some words of warning to his inexperienced teammates on the Green Bay Packers offensive line.

"I'm telling them they're on their own this year," said Hallstrom. "I did what I could last year for them, but this year I have to get back in the groove."

It's doubtful, however, if any of his teammates believe him. You see, everyone connected with the Packers is finding out that Hallstrom can't help sacrificing himself for the good of the team. It's in Hallstrom's green-and-gold blood. Even his wife, Mary Pat, is a team player.

Mary Pat Hallstrom was told by her doctor last fall that she would probably deliver her baby on the weekend the Packers were scheduled to play in Pittsburgh. "Such a schedule conflict just won't do," said Mary Pat. So she had her doctor induce labor a few days early so her husband wouldn't miss the game.

"The problem was, "Hallstrom adds with a chuckle, "Mary Pat forgot to have the baby right away."

Although Mary Pat was in labor for 15 hours, she still delivered a healthy baby girl (they named her Emily) on Friday before the Packers played the Steelers. That meant Hallstrom could play the entire game in Pittsburgh. As it turned out, he wished he had missed the game because the Packers fell 27-3.

"Coach (Forrest) Gregg told me Mary Pat's a good football wife, a real trooper," says Hallstrom proudly.

Well, Hallstrom's a pretty good trooper himself; so much so that the huge guard earned a promotion to the rank of captain last year.

Gregg said the decision to make the 6-6, 290-pounder the offensive captain was easy. Gregg watched him last summer and fall working with the young, inexperienced linemen who would eventually develop into key contributors on the team.

"He just took the responsibility upon himself," Gregg said. "It was like he had to take care of all of them. And that's basically what he did. He would make sure that they knew what they were doing. He spent a lot of time with them, going over things, working with techniques."

Gregg said it was a difficult season for Hallstrom - one of the biggest guards in the NFL - because he was surrounded by so much inexperience.

"He had Alan Veingrad beside him. Veingrad was a free agent rookie and I know during a ball game - the average guy doesn't know this - that Ron's worrying about what Alan's doing," Gregg said. "At the same time, during the year he had four different centers that lined up beside him. I think half the time he probably had to check over there to see whose name he was calling.

"That just had to be upsetting to him."

Hallstrom chuckled when he started talking about last year's patchwork offensive line. But he spoke with pride when he said he had never played on a better offensive line in his five years in Green Bay.

"That's because everyone was trying to help the other guy," Hallstrom said. "And that's the way you have to play on the offensive line. You have to realize your strengths and your weaknesses and the guy's next to you. When you get in a situation, that guy has to help you out, or when he's in a situation, you help him out. You have to work that way or you won't be consistent."

Hallstrom says the fact that the offensive line performed well last season was more important to him than his own performance. "You can kind of get satisfaction at seeing younger guys listening to you and doing some of the things that you teach them," he said. "As long as I can help someone be a better player as well as becoming a better player myself, that's what I look for."

Hallstrom began feeling that way shortly after he became entrenched as the Packers' starting right guard three years ago. It was a long process before Hallstrom, a surprise first-round draft choice out of Iowa in 1982, could feel secure with the Packers. And it was a process Hallstrom wouldn't wish upon his worst enemy, let alone a young teammate.

As a rookie, Hallstrom found out early how tough training camp could be when linebacker Kurt Allerman broke Hallstrom's nose during a fight at practice. There were whispers that Hallstrom, who played just one year on Iowa's offensive line, was a wasted pick by the Packers. Certainly, progress was minimal and he was the fourth guard listed on the depth charts.

Off the field, Hallstrom was the constant target of veterans who loved to haze first-round picks and knew the big Iowan had trouble handling the abuse.

Hallstrom's second year wasn't much better. The Packers decided to switch him to tackle and he spent most of the season backing up veteran Karl Swanke. Through it all, Hallstrom was crying out inside for some help from any teammate or coach.

"There's not a lot of technical coaching in the professional ranks," Hallstrom said. "A lot of it comes from theory and how to basically beat your opponent. You have to have the physical skills already - which most players do - but in my case I didn't have much of the technical work. That hurt me my first couple of years."

The third year turned out to be much better. During the off-season, Gregg had replaced Bart Starr as the Packer Head Coach and Jerry Wampfler was brought in as the offensive line coach. Both Gregg and Wampfler are fans of huge offensive linemen and Hallstrom fit their mold.

Ron Hallstrom, promoted to captain, developed into a team leader in 1986.

Early in the season, however, Hallstrom was still a backup tackle and remained on the team only as insurance for injured starting tackle Greg Koch. But Hallstrom finally got his chance in the second game of the season when Gregg shook up the line and made the eager lineman the starting right guard.

Hallstrom's been steadily improving ever since. He also has vowed never to forget what he went through to find security and feels obligated to pass along his trade secrets to anyone who will listen.

"Sometimes I think some guys look at me and think, 'Well, he's kind of a smart ass because he thinks he knows it all,' Hallstrom said with a laugh. "Well, I know what it was like when I was young and there was no one talking to me.

"When I was a young player, I always wanted somebody to come up and say, 'You have to do this' or 'You have to do that.' But what I always heard was, 'Well, that's what I had to go through, you're on your own.'

"I don't believe that's the way it should be," Hallstrom continued. "When I came up here, I needed somebody to help me out. But that never happened. It's something I look back on and say, 'Hey, if I can help a young guy out, I will.' "

Hallstrom, now 28 and one of the oldest players on the line, said too many veteran players are afraid to help young teammates for fear of losing their jobs to them.

"But that's not the point," he said. "You want the team to win. You want the team to be good. I just want these guys to get better and learn what it takes to win football games and how to play aggressive. We didn't win a lot of games but these guys gained a lot of experience."

Hallstrom also learned a key to leadership is showing his teammates he can play with pain. For a large part of last season, Hallstrom hobbled on a sprained ankle. But he persevered, never missing a practice or a game.

"That's something you have to instill in these young guys, to realize that you have to play with pain," Hallstrom said. "That's the difference between a good player and an average player. You're not going to help your team by sitting on the bench with little nicks and bruises."

Despite the Packers' 4-12 record in '86 and an individual performance he felt could have been better, Hallstrom still looks back at last season with affection. It was the year Hallstrom felt he grew up the most in his life.

"Becoming a father is the best thing that has ever happened to me," he said. "I have a beautiful wife and we have a beautiful baby. It's nice. You kind of look at the things you did your first couple of years and nothing can really match up to what I have now."

Off the field, Hallstrom has taken his bright outlook on life to several speaking engagements around the Midwest. He does volunteer work for the Arrowhead Ranch, a place for delinquent boys located in a suburb of the Quad Cities, where he grew up and lives in the off-season. Hallstrom's also involved in the "Just Say No" anti-drug campaign in Kenosha and the United Way.

"I enjoy things like that," said Hallstrom. "I enjoy meeting people and helping people who are less fortunate. I want to do as much as I can to help them. I wasn't born with a silver spoon in my mouth, so I know how some of them feel."

On the field, Hallstrom learned the true meaning of team effort. "I think I matured the best way I could and that's the fact that I have to accept everyone on the team as a whole and a unit and realize the only way to get there is as a team. You can't get there individually."

But that doesn't mean Hallstrom isn't going to set aside more time for himself this year as he strives for the all-pro status many feel he deserves.

"I'd love to be all-pro, but there's a lot of politics involved in things like that," Hallstrom said. "I just go out and play as hard as I can and be the best possible player I can be. Everything else will take care of itself ... as long as I have the time to just worry about myself once in a while.

"I don't think I was hurting myself in what I was doing last year," Hallstrom added. "I just wasn't doing things I was capable of doing."

On the field, maybe. But in so many other phases, Hallstrom was accomplishing more things than the Packers ever could have hoped.

Braatz is back home

By CLIFF CHRISTL
Milwaukee Journal

Tom Braatz has returned to his roots.

After being away for more than 30 years, Braatz has returned to his native state as the new executive vice president of football operations for the Green Bay Packers.

There is still some Texan in Braatz from his days with the Dallas Cowboys, for whom he played defensive end, and the Ithaca Gun Co., for whom he worked as an arms demonstrator. One look at his lizard-skin cowboy boots provides evidence of that. "I don't have shoes," said Braatz. "Just boots."

Braatz also was comfortable living in Georgia while spending 22 years with the Atlanta Falcons.

No place, however, would seem more compatible with Braatz's laid-back, unpretentious style than Green Bay. He is more at home fishing on an inland lake, having a beer at a corner bar and going out for a Friday night fish fry than he is in an environment of motion and glitter.

"I like those kinds of places," said Braatz. "I like Wisconsin. I like the people. I like the fishing. I like the outdoor sports that go with it."

A native of Kenosha and former captain of Marquette University's football team, Braatz joined the Packers on January 31, 1987. In a major restructuring of the organization, Braatz was given parallel authority with Coach Forrest Gregg.

His areas of responsibility include the administration of the personnel department, the draft and player signings.

Since the Lombardi era, control of the football operations of the Packers has been centralized in one person - the head coach. It is a system that worked for Lombardi and has worked elsewhere in the league, but not for the Packers for the past 19 years.

The job appeared to have become too much for one man. Since 1959, Lombardi's first year, the number of teams in the league had jumped from 12 to 28, rosters had increased from 32 to 45 players and the draft had gone from a petty cash to maybe a $1 million a year operation.

With this in mind, Judge Robert Parins, president of the corporation, conducted an extensive search to find a football administrator to work in tandem with Gregg. After countless phone calls to research candidates, and several interviews, Parins selected Braatz.

"There are a number of names of people that have surfaced who would be qualified to fill this position," said Parins. "The one name that surfaced with everyone was Tom Braatz.

Braatz had turned down the Packers once before when Bart Starr had asked him to join the organization in the midst of his nine-year stay as head coach. And Braatz wasn't sure he wanted the job this time, either.

He remembered the tug-of-war that went on in Atlanta between Pat Peppler, former general manager, and Marion Campbell, then in his first stint as head coach, when specific lines of authority hadn't been spelled out by the owner. And Braatz remembered that his old friend, Bobby Beathard, had to survive a power struggle with former coach Jack Pardee to retain his position as general manager with the Washington Redskins.

So at the NFL combine workout at Indianapolis in late January, Braatz sought out Beathard as he contemplated the job opportunity with the Packers. "I asked him what the pitfalls were," said Braatz. Next, Braatz met with Gregg. "When the Judge brought me up for an interview, he said the coach was 100% behind it," said Braatz. "But until I could sit down and hear it from the coach, there wasn't any way I was coming."

Satisfied the arrangement would work after meeting with Gregg, Braatz accepted the job the next day with peace of mind concerning the organizational structure, but also knowing the challenge ahead was immense.

In 1986, the Packers finished with a 4-12 record, the fourth worst in their 68-year history. They showed some late season improvement, but were obviously shy on overall caliber of players it takes to reach the playoffs.

"If you color code this team," said Braatz, "and blue is a Pro Bowl player, red is a player who is good enough to win with, purple is a player who can go up or down and orange is a stopgap player that needs to be replaced, this team does not have enough red players.

"There aren't any blue players here. There are a handful of red players. But the team is predominantly purple."

As Braatz sees it, the Packers can't be expected to mount a challenge for the playoffs in 1987. But in 1988, he thinks they can make a move, maybe - that is, if the draft held last April and the one to be held next April prove successful.

And that, of course, is Braatz's job - to see to it that they are.

"I think if you have a quarterback and a defensive scheme, you can do it in two years," said Braatz.

Thus, the priorities he established for his first drafts were the same as they were in Atlanta. Priority number one is a quarterback. At this point, Braatz is hopeful that the Packers already have their answer in Randy Wright or Robbie Bosco. The next highest premium will be placed on offensive and defensive linemen, and, to a certain extent, linebackers. Ranking third on the list is a franchise running back.

Thus, it was no accident that the Packers selected Auburn halfback Brent Fullwood, two linebackers, Johnny Holland and Scott Stephen, and tackle Dave Croston with their first four picks in the '87 draft. Braatz was simply adhering to a long-held philosophy.

"You've got to have a quarterback," said Braatz. "Then, you need to build a fence around the quarterback. The name of the game on defense is defensive linemen. And then the impact player after a quarterback is a running back. Big people, a quarterback and a running back are the people you should pick with your high picks."

That, of course, isn't an original idea. It's a course that the New York Giants followed to the Super Bowl last year and the Chicago Bears the year before. No doubt, Gregg and his predecessor, Bart Starr, subscribed to the same theory. However, all too often in the past, stopgap moves foiled sound planning.

A thoughtful Tom Braatz fields questions for media during draft.

What the Packers hope to gain from Braatz's presence is direction and stability and long-range vision. Already he has invoked changes within the organization with those factors in mind.

One, the Packers eliminated much of the chaos in their draft room by limiting the number of people involved in the decision-making process. Only Braatz, Gregg, Parins and Dick Corrick, now the director of college scouting, were welcome in the draft room from start to finish last April. The scouts and coaches were summoned for input throughout the day, but were otherwise removed from the main stage.

"With all the time and money you put into preparing, that 24-hour period on draft day has to be under control," said Braatz. "Everyone is involved, but you can't have all the scouts, all the coaches, all the front office people there. There is not enough room, and you've got to have solitude to think and talk trade on the phone."

Two, the assistant coaches were still involved with the draft, but with a specific purpose. Their opinion on how a player would fit into the Packers' scheme was valued, but their say in overriding a scout's season-long work was diminished.

Three, scouts have been given assignments by position rather than geographical area. Corrick will see the top 200 prospects as a national scout. Among the holdovers, Dave Hanner will scout the running backs and kickers; Charley Armey, the linebackers and defensive backs; and Ray Wietecha, the offensive linemen and tight ends. Bob Riggle and Jon Jelacic, who were hired from the Atlanta Falcons, will scout the quarterbacks and wide receivers, and defensive linemen, respectively.

Accountability was the objective

How The Packers Were Built

Head Coach Forrest Gregg, intent upon re-stocking his team with new faces in quest of "bigger, stronger, better people," took a different personnel tack in 1986. He augmented the customary harvest from the draft by venturing into other areas extensively, adding 13 players via the free agent market, three on waivers and one other by trade. With these moves, plus six newcomers from the draft, he now has made 35 additions to the holdovers from prior years. The latter, incidentally, numbered only 12 at press time.

This is how the Packers were built through 1986 (before, of course, 1987's draft choices and free agents began their bids for employment):

behind the moves.

"Now, you can go back to a scout and you can put him on a hook for a player that was selected," said Braatz. "If you do it by area, you can't do that. Scouting by area is semi-retirement. This is a whole new plan, and it's harder for an older person to do it."

Instead of driving, scouts will be hopscotching the country by plane. Instead of setting their own schedules and living out of the trunk of their cars, their daily routine will be dictated by airline schedules and disrupted by the hassles of making connecting flights, lining up rental cars and eating on the run.

And, finally, the area of pro scouting, long neglected by the Packers, will be coordinated by one person on a full-time basis. Chuck Hutchison, formerly director of player procurement, has been named pro scout. It will be his job to study film of the other 27 teams and keep an up-to-date rating on all the players in the league.

"When I got here, I asked for grades on the other 27 teams and they couldn't provide it," said Braatz.

The added cost of all this could exceed $100,000. But Braatz is hopeful that it will be money well spent.

There are no guarantees, of course. When he was with Atlanta, Braatz gained a reputation throughout the league for having a keen eye for talent. He was responsible for the Falcons drafting the likes of William Andrews, Mike Kenn, Gerald Riggs, Bill Fralic, Rick Bryan and several other players who would get no worse than a red tag on any team's color-coded board. Nevertheless, the Falcons never had better than hit-and-miss success on the field.

Perhaps it was because there were too many coaching changes or perhaps it was because there was too much interference by the Smith family, which owns controlling interest in the franchise.

Whatever, the chemistry wasn't there. And, certainly, it hasn't been here in Green Bay since Lombardi departed. But maybe now it will blend together the way it did in Washington after Beathard was hired and the way it did for the New York Giants after George Young was hired.

Only time, of course, will tell, but the fact that Braatz was hired is testimony that the Packers are unwilling to accept the status quo of being an also-ran in the National Football Conference.

'87 PACKERS DRAFT REMINISCENT OF '58

Most experts on Packer personnel - and there are many "non-salaried" members of the faithful who would consider themselves such - agree that Green Bay's 1958 draft was perhaps the most productive in its history.

To refresh the memory, it brought the Packers no fewer than four all-pro performers - linebackers Ray Nitschke and Dan Currie, fullback Jim Taylor and guard Jerry Kramer - two of whom (Nitschke and Taylor) eventually were enshrined in the Pro Football Hall of Fame.

Little wonder then that more than casual interest was engendered when Head Coach Forrest Gregg favorably compared the Packers' 1987 draft to that historic '58 harvest.

He obviously was referring to such as:

--Brent Fullwood, the gifted halfback from Auburn, the Packers' first choice in last April's National Football League selection meeting;

--Linebacker Johnny Holland of Texas A & M, a heralded second round pick;

--Offensive tackle Dave Croston of Iowa, considered one of the premier offensive linemen in the nation;

--Linebacker Scott Stephen of Arizona State, counted upon to bolster the Packers' pass rush; and

--Wide receiver Frankie Neal of Fort Hays State (KS), who could be the big "wideout" needed to replace the departed James Lofton.

Gregg, elaborating on his comparison to that '58 draft, said there were two factors which prompted him to make it.

"It's two things," he said. "It was a good draft year, as far as personnel was concerned ... Also where we drafted was a big key. Now you take those two things and, if you did your homework, you should get some players that will have an impact on your football team.

"And, from what I see out of those draft choices, I see potential starters for this year and I see, certainly, several of those people are going to make our football team."

The Packer cause was aided in this vintage year by two additional choices resulting from trades - one which sent Lofton to the Los Angeles Raiders and brought a third round pick as the initial payment, and a draft day exchange with the Atlanta Falcons which gave the Packers a third selection in the third round. They did not have a choice in the fifth round - that pick went to San Diego to complete the Mossy Cade deal of 1985 - but that void was offeset with an additional 7th-round choice acquired from Cleveland in the 1985 trade which sent John Jefferson to the Browns. They also owed Seattle a 12th-round pick for tight end Dan Ross but balanced that payment by collecting a 12th-round choice from the New York Giants for Phil McConkey.

Overall, the Packers selected seven offensive players (one running back, two offensive linemen, three wide receivers, and a quarterback), six defensive players (three linemen, two linebackers and a cornerback) and one specialist (punter Bill Smith of Ole Miss).

The prize pick, inevitably, figures to be Fullwood, a brilliant breakaway runner who averaged better than eight yards per carry as a senior in 1986 while making Auburn fans forget the storied Bo Jackson, who had been the first choice overall in the '86 NFL draft.

A 5-foot-11, 209-pound athlete with impressive (4.3) speed in the '40,' Fullwood set an Auburn career record with a glittering 7.15-yard rushing average (2,789 yards in 390 attempts).

Fullwood's selection marks the second consecutive year the Packers have made a running back their top choice. A year ago, they selected halfback Kenneth Davis of Texas Christian University in the second round (they were without a first round pick because of the Cade transaction with San Diego).

The highly productive Auburn alumnus is expected to team with Davis and Gary Ellerson to provide both depth and long strike firepower at tailback.

Holland, a versatile athlete who entered Texas A & M as a quarterback and later moved to free safety before settling in at linebacker his sophomore year, is labeled by Packer linebacker coach Dale Lindsey as "a playmaker who makes tackles from sideline to sideline." Blessed with impressive 4.6 speed, he has been one of the most productive players in the college ranks the last two years, having been involved in 297 tackles during that span.

Croston is an accomplished weight lifter who was rated the top left offensive tackle on the college scene in 1986. Capable of bench pressing over 500 pounds, he was chosen on the All-America Strength Team each of the last two years.

The 6-foot-2, 235-pound Stephen is described by Lindsey as "a guy with impact potential, on the order of Tim Harris." A strong pass rusher, he registered six quarterback sacks for Arizona State last season. He also had two interceptions.

Neal is one of two "big" wide receivers chosen, the other being Willie Marshall of Temple, selected in the fifth round. Neal, a deep threat because of his speed, averaged over 20 yards per catch each of his last three years in college, including an imposing 24.4 yards for 20 receptions in 1985.

Marshall, 6-1 and 190 pounds, also is a big play receiver. He averaged 20.5 yards per catch over four varsity seasons at Temple and finished his career owning the school's records for both receiving yardage (2.272) and 100-yard receiving games (six). A gifted athlete, he was a 6-7 1/2 high jumper in high school and had a Division I basketball offer from Rutgers.

Defensive Coordinator Dick Modzelewski also acquired three prospects to augment his front line - and hopefully the pass rush - in Lorenzo Freeman of Pittsburgh, 6-5 and 270, taken in the fourth round; Tony Leiker of Stanford, 6-5 and 258, in the seventh; and Jeff Drost of Iowa, 6-5 and 286, an eighth-round pick.

tackle, impressed Modzelewski with his intensity and "his explosion off the line of scrimmage."

Leiker, an end who was a PAC-10 All-Academic selection, caught the coordinator's eye with his "good hand-eye coordination on the pass-rush," an area of concern in 1986.

Drost, an All-Big Ten selection as a junior and a former star wrestler in high school, already has made a deep impression on the head coach. "Jeff Drost is going to make whoever lines up in front of him work for a living, I can tell you that right now," Gregg says of the massive newcomer.

In the ninth round, the Packers acquired offensive tackle Gregg Harris of Wake Forest, who is 6-4 and 279 pounds. Gregg also likes what he has seen of the Norfolk, Virginia native, asserting, "He is a very, very good athlete. He has the athletic ability to make it and play in this league (but) he must get stronger."

Tenth rounder Don Majkowski, a quarterback from Virginia, graduated ranking first on the school's all-time passing list (3,901 yards) and on the Cavaliers' total offensive list (4,632). He impressed Packer quarterback coach George Sefcik with his athletic ability. "He runs well," Sefcik says, "and has the ability to avoid the rush."

The eleventh round produced a third wide receiver, Patrick Scott of Grambling, a 6-foot, 182-pound performer whose stock in trade is versatility. He was employed as a kick returner and running back, as well as a wide receiver, as a collegian. He had 49 catches for 766 yards and six touchdowns as a senior.

Smith, one of the larger specialists around at 6-3 and 222 pounds, was the premier punter in the nation in 1986, averaging 44.3 yards for 57 punts. Possessor of exceptional leg strength, he had a career average of 44.4 yards for 254 punts, including an imposing 47.7 mark as a sophomore in 1984.

Twelfth rounder Norman Jefferson of LSU, the cornerback, had the distinction of being the 335th and last player chosen in the '87 draft.

Also a kick returner, he registered 10 interceptions as a collegian, including five as a sophomore.

Paul Hornung Receives Hall Of Fame Ring

It was poetic...

The Packers were hosting the Chicago Bears, their mortal and favorite enemies, and there was a capacity house in Green Bay's Lambeau Field for a nationally televised "Monday Night Football" collision the night of September 22, 1986.

An auspicious setting, to be sure, for one of the more memorable and sentimental moments in recent Packer history.

The focus, inevitably, would be on the primordial rivals as soon as the football was kicked off.

But the pre-game spotlight on this occasion belonged to a storied Packer of an earlier day, the popular and perennial "Golden Boy," Paul Hornung.

A major and charismatic figure in Green Bay's drive to four National Football League championships under the late Vince Lombardi in the 60's, he had had to wait 20 years to make the Pro Football Hall of Fame, an honor which had been formalized on the steps of the shrine at Canton, Ohio., only seven weeks earlier.

On this night, he was officially receiving his prized Hall of Fame ring on the venerable turf - appropriately enough - where he had escorted Green Bay to a host of victories, among them a 23-12 NFL title triumph over the Cleveland Browns in the 1965 championship game.

Hornung had been a prominent factor in the latter, rushing for 104 yards in 18 carries and scoring the winning touchdown as the Packers captured the first of a record three consecutive NFL crowns.

Pete Elliott, executive director of the Hall of Fame, presented the ring to the former Heisman Trophy winner (1956) in the pre-game ceremony, triggering a vocal and boisterous ovation for the man who wore Number 5 with flair and finesse for nine memorable seasons (1957-66).

Moved by this outpouring of affection, Hornung responded in kind. He told the 55,527 fans, "I just want to thank all of you for being so supportive of Paul Hornung through the years ... You're the greatest football fans in the NFL."

Willie Davis Tosses Coin For Super Bowl XXI

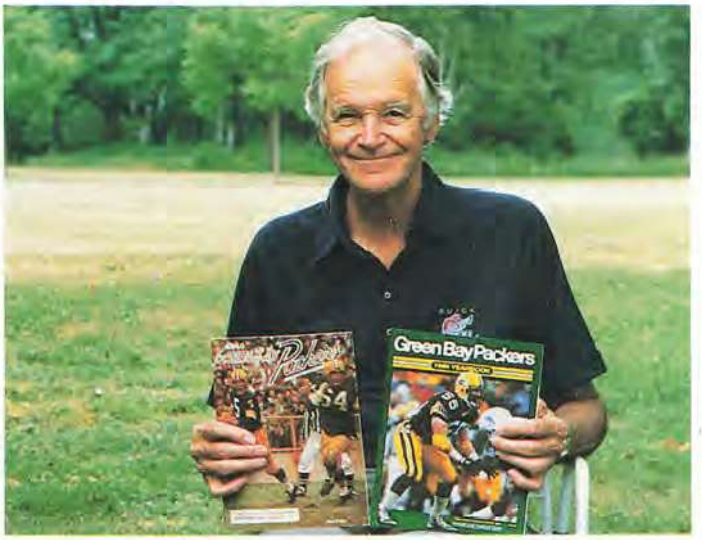
Willie Davis had a right to smile ...

Standing on the sun-splashed turf of the Rose Bowl at Pasadena, he proudly displays the gold coin he shortly would flip for the rival captains in the pre-game ceremony for Super Bowl XXI between the New York Giants and Denver Broncos last January 25.

It was a prestigious assignment and the genial Hall of Famer was a highly appropriate choice, following such as pro football pioneer George Halas and the late Marie Lombardi in the role - because he had been there at the beginning.

Just 20 years earlier, he was involved in a similar ceremony, representing the Packers on that occasion as defensive captain when they prepared to face the Kansas City Chiefs in the first Super Bowl at the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum.

Willie Davis proudly displays the Super Bowl XXI Ceremonial Coin.



Art Daley will continue to contribute articles to the book he co-founded - The Green Bay Packer

"I never envisioned the game would be as big as it is," mused Willie, now a prosperous Los Angeles business executive, "or command as much attention as it does."

Harking back to that baptismal Super Bowl (January 15, 1967) - it actually was known as the AFL-NFL Championship Game at the time - Willie did acknowledge, "I'd never seen Vince Lombardi more nervous about a game than he was about that one.

"I enjoy the Super Bowl more now," he added in discussing his role. "I'm happy to just flip the coin, let 'em play 60 minutes and, whoever wins, I'll feel good for the team that does ... There'll be no sadness, really.

"It's a big victory because of all the hype," Davis observed. "It's also a big loss, because of all the hype."

Big victories were no novelty to the hustling Grambling alumnus as a player. As the left defensive end on Lombardi's Packers in the 1960's, he played on six conference championship teams and five world champions, including Super Bowls I and II.

Davis, who never missed a game in his career with the Packers (1960-69), originally was drafted out of Grambling by Cleveland on the 15th round in 1956. After two years in the Army, he played two seasons for the Browns on both the offensive and defensive lines.

When he was traded to Green Bay in 1960, Lombardi noting Davis' quickness and reaction time, put him at defensive end. Willie subsequently owned the position; he was named all-pro five times in a six-year span (1962, 1964-67) and played in the Pro Bowl five years in a row (1964-68).

Upon his retirement in 1969, Davis put his master's degree from the University of Chicago to good use. He now owns four radio stations and a Los Angeles beer distributorship.

Art Daley, An 'Institution,' Retires

Art Daley, a man of genuine and becoming modesty, would be the last one to consider himself an institution.

But an "institution," nevertheless, he is.

Few, if any, have written about the Green Bay Packers with such enthusiasm and affection for so long.

Art, who it's rumored would bleed green and gold if he chanced to cut a finger, has been benevolently chronicling the Packers' triumphs and tribulations for more than 50 years - ever since he became sports editor of the Fond du Lac (Wisconsin) Commonwealth Reporter in 1934 at the age of 18.

Over the years, his loyalty has become legendary, both as sports editor of the Green Bay Press-Gazette for 21 years and as editor of this publication, the Packer Yearbook, from the time he co-founded it with John Yuenger until the present.

During the late 40's and the 50's, when the Packers were struggling through a number of losing seasons, Press-Gazette carrier boys would facetiously allege the newspaper was heavier on Monday afternoons following a loss because the sports pages were soggy from the tears in Art's game report.

Admittedly, he has always found it difficult to be critical of his "boys." There can be no better example than his story the day following the Packers' 56-0 loss to the Baltimore Colts in 1958 - the worst defeat in their history.

Art loyally began his report: "BALTIMORE (PG) - The Baltimore Colts are not that good ... And the Green Bay Packers certainly aren't that bad ... "

Despite such traumatic experiences, he always has been - and remains to this day - a perennial and incurable optimist. Ask him any year to predict the Packers' won-and-lost record and Art will invariably say, "We're going to go 16-and-0."

And he will continue to be both a loyalist and an optimist, even though he has ended his formal association with the Packer Yearbook, having retired as associate publisher following publication of the 1986 issue and completion of a three-year agreement with the new publisher.

There was no way, in fact, that Art could stay totally away from the Yearbook, which for more than a quarter of a century has been a source of pride and a labor of love for him. As "Editor Emeritus" he has kept his hand in - at the publisher's request - by authoring the story, "Packers Erased Small Town Label With Title Triumphs," which begins on page 27 of this 1987 Yearbook.

We hope he will return for many more such editorial "encores," not only because of the unique perspective he presents but because the Packers never have had a more loyal fan or a better friend.

And because the Yearbook would not be the same without him.

Lawrence Taylor, the best football player on the planet, stood on the unfriendly side of the ball, his eyes trained hungrily on Randy Wright.

All the New York Giants' linebacker had to do was zero in on the Green Bay Packers' quarterback twice to become the National Football League's all-time single-season sack leader, hardly a mission impossible considering Taylor's subsequent selection as the NFL's most valuable player for 1986.

But, in the final game of the regular season, the rebuilding Packers had both the plan, and the man, to effectively neutralize Taylor. In fact, the man was the plan.

Whenever Taylor lined up on his customary launching pad at right outside linebacker, he was the responsibility of Ken Ruettgers, the Packers' second-year left tackle from the University of Southern California. It was Ruettgers' assignment to keep the relentless Taylor out of Wright's face in passing situations, something no one had been able to accomplish in 15 previous games.

When this particular game was over, however, Wright hadn't seen enough of Taylor to pick him out of a police lineup.

No sacks.

No pressures.

No factor.

"I basically felt that I was either going to be the goat or the hero," Ruettgers said of his matchup in the Meadowlands. "We didn't win the game, so I don't think anyone can feel like a hero. But I wasn't the goat, either.

"How do you explain winning and losing at the same time?"

You explain it this way: When the Packers made a risky draft day deal back in 1985 to improve their position from 14th to seventh in the first round in order to select Ruettgers, they lost a second-round 1985 pick but may have won in the long run.

Two years later, the 6-foot-5, 285-pound Ruettgers has established himself as one of the NFL's most impressive young linemen. The shutout he pitched at Taylor merely solidified the notion that Ruettgers can be a dominant player at the all-important left tackle position, where the typical opponent is the NFL's version of a heatseeking missile - a quick, lean pass-rushing defensive end.

"The trade looks real good to me right now," said Packer coach Forrest Gregg, who orchestrated the deal with the Buffalo Bills. "We got a guy that should be there and be outstanding for the next 10 years."

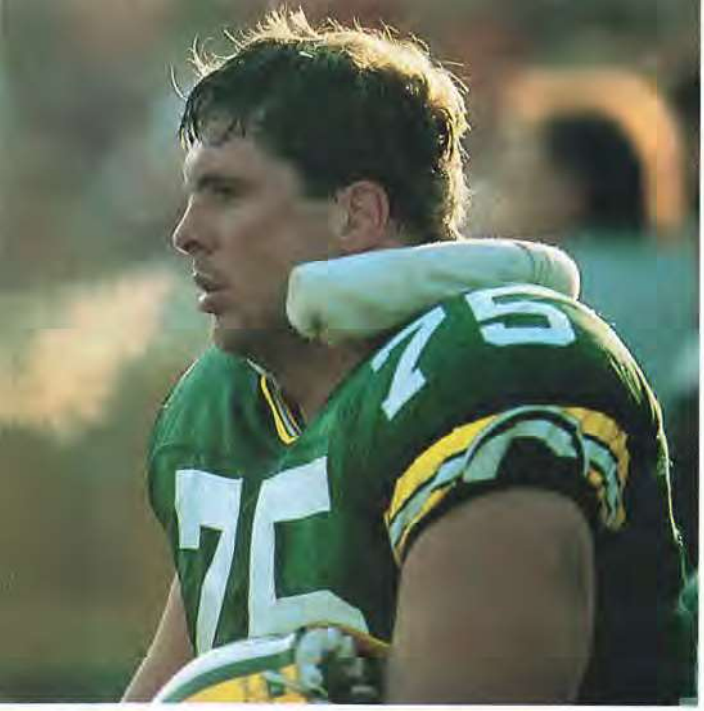
RUETTGERS REIGNS



Ruettgers takes a "breather" - literally.

Ruettgers' first two seasons were filled with growth. Yet there was occasionally painful development, beginning when he missed 3 1/2 weeks of his rookie training camp while his contract was being negotiated. He started only two late-season games as a rookie, then assumed the job full time last year when veteran Karl Swanke couldn't return from knee surgery by the start of the season.

"His rookie year he got to play toward the end of the year and we could see that he was improving," Gregg said. "He came back in training camp last year and he had a lot of work to do because he had missed much of the training camp the previous year. I don't know that I've ever seen a football player put his nose to the grindstone any more than Ken Ruettgers did. Every day he stayed out after practice and worked on the things that he felt (offensive line coach) Jerry Wampfler wanted him to work on.

"He just constantly improved. By the end of the year I thought Ken was playing great football and I think that last game against the Giants sort of capped things off for Ken as far as the year was concerned."

The rocky part of Ruettgers' development came early last year, when he appeared to level off in training camp. He seemed bogged down by technique and had lost the aggressiveness for which he was noted at USC. About the second week of the season, however, Ruettgers' game began to flow, becoming more instinctive and less mechanical. With the exception of a game against the Chicago Bears - when Richard Dent nicked him for two sacks - Ruettgers dominated opponents throughout the second half of the season.

An articulate and thoughtful man, Ruettgers tries to remain realistic about his upward mobility in the NFL.

"I just think I'm a hard worker, a blue-collar type guy," he said. "I work hard and try to do my best, try to win. I don't think I'm a great athlete. I think I make up for a lot of things I don't have through hard work. I've seen a lot greater athletes that don't work as hard. But that's one of the great things about life: You can work hard to make up for the God-given abilities that you lack."

Nevertheless, Ruettgers' combination of athletic ability, size, work ethic, intelligence and temperament make him an ideal player to anchor a young line that has been three years in the making.

"We're pleased with where he is in his career," Gregg said. "He'll continue to improve because he's one of those people who will spend the time necessary to get better. Certainly, I like his ability; he's a good athlete. But it's more than that. It's his attitude toward the game and his work ethic."

Ruettgers' off-season schedule is testimony to his status as a workaholic. A financial real estate major at USC, Ruettgers has worked for five off-seasons as a real estate appraiser in his hometown of Bakersfield, California. However, this year he spent only five hours a day on the job. An equal amount of time daily was spent working out, where his variety of athletic endeavors would put Bruce Jenner to shame.

Ruettgers' off-season workout routine varies, but he stretches, hits the speed bag and jumps rope daily, lifts weight four days a week, runs three days a week, takes karate and plays basketball two days a week and even throws in an occasional racquetball game.

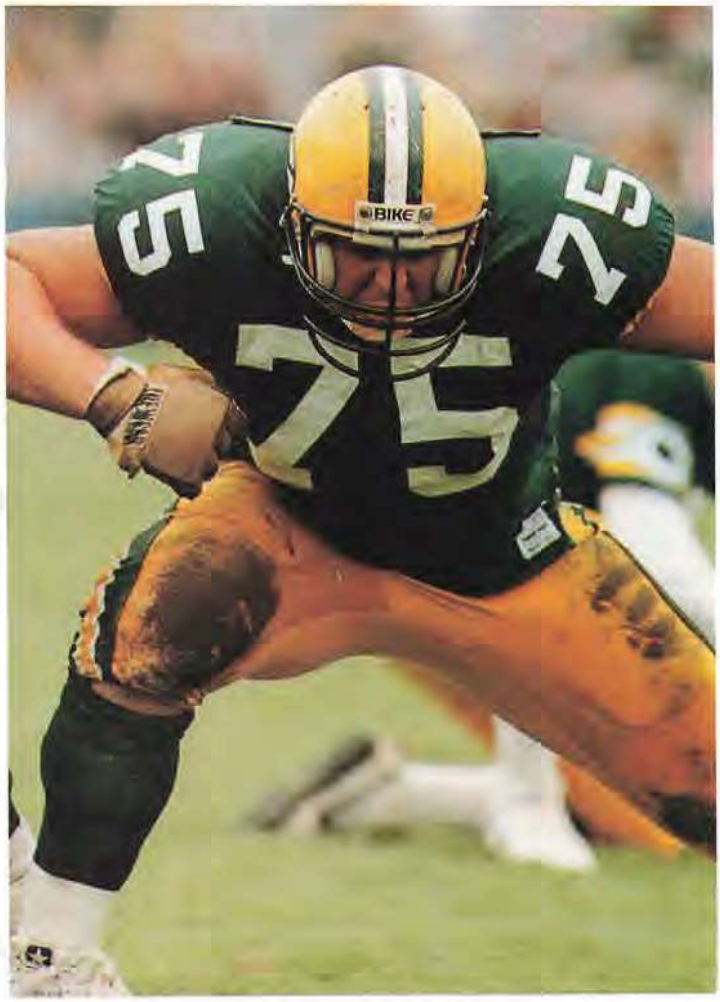
He's just as conscientious outside the workout room. He uses plyometrics techniques designed by Russian trainers to increase agility. He listens to country music because he read somewhere that it increases the flow of endorphin, a natural tonic produced by the body. He takes vitamins and follows a low-fat diet in which he diets for six days and then eats anything he wants on Sunday.

He even asked the Packers' public relations staff to collect photos of his 1987 opponents - Taylor, Dent, Dexter Manley, Rulon Jones, Howie Long, Ron Holmes, Reggie Rogers - so he can place them nearby when he does karate workouts or hits the speed bag.

"It's just another motivating tool," Ruettgers said. "I'm trying to incorporate every little thing I can. It's amazing the little things you can do to get the edge."

That's one thing the Packers love about Ruettgers.

"He studies his opponents and keeps a book on them like the good ones do," Wampfler said. "He's a professional."



An imposing 6'5", 285 lb. Ken Ruettgers is the picture of intensity.

Ruettgers says the more he learns about football, the more he realizes there is more to learn. His intensity on and off the field is legendary. Although he's friendly and approachable, reporters seldom bother him after games because he's just too wound up to say much. Better to get him a day later.

No matter what his level of success, though, Ruettgers just keeps working harder.

"How can I improve? That's a very broad question," he said. "There's a whole gamut. I'd just like to see myself carry over a hard off-season workout program into the season, keep my work habits up, improve on my run blocking. You can improve everywhere you look. I can work on my mental part of the game, being able to evaluate film of my opponent. That comes with experience and effort."

Stardom has been predicted for Ruettgers and he admits that, at times, he feels like he is on the verge of greatness. "But mostly I feel that I've got a long ways to go," he added with a chuckle. "As soon as you start thinking you don't have a long ways to go, maybe it's time to get out of the business."

The Packers hope that before Ruettgers gets out of the business he includes trips to the Pro Bowl and the Super Bowl on his itinerary.

"I try not to make any goals other than being a hard worker," Ruettgers said. "I think my goal, as it has been from the very beginning, is to be a contributing factor and help the Packers win. All of the extracurricular stuff like the Pro Bowl and all-pro, that all comes with winning and being a hard worker and executing. If you take care of the other things first, that's just icing on the cake. I think winning has to be your number 1 goal."

Ruettgers' one-for-all and all-for-one attitude disappears when he considers the Packers' 1987 schedule. He doesn't think in terms of playing the Bears, Los Angeles Raiders and Denver Broncos. Instead, he thinks in terms of playing Dent, Long and Jones, the marquee names on a lengthy list of quality opponents he'll face this season.

"You shoot for zero sacks," Ruettgers said. "It's possible, I think. I really do. It's very hard. I didn't give up any sacks my senior year of college, but I wasn't going up against the tough competition week in and week out. Trying to keep that whole list sack-free week in and week out is going to be tough."

No tougher than spending an afternoon jousting with Taylor, whom Ruettgers will run into again late in the season.

Hemmed in, Kenneth Davis, Packer's leading rusher in '86, sets sights on 'daylight.'

DAVIS:

"I know my role now"

By GEORGE SAUERBERG
Milwaukee Sentinel

Kenneth Davis rushed over the Giants Stadium turf like the wind that whistles across the Jersey Mead-owlands.

He covered 50 yards on a second-quarter play in the season finale against the New York Giants. It was the longest run from scrimmage in 1986 for the Green Bay Packers.

The Packer rookie's romp also was the longest run last season against the eventual Super Bowl champions, who ranked first in rushing defense in the NFL.

With first-and-15 on the Packer 34-yard line after an offsides penalty, Davis started around right end, then broke back toward the middle of the field. He got to the Giants' 16 before he was brought down by Lawrence Taylor and Kenny Hill.

The play set up the Packers' first touchdown, a 13-yard pass from Randy Wright to Eddie Lee Ivery that enabled Green Bay to cut its deficit to 24-7. The Packers came within a touchdown of the Giants before losing, 55-24.

Davis' long run has a special significance for the Packers' top draft choice, who had had a disappointing year.

"I realized I was coming back," he says. "It was the Kenneth Davis of old coming back.

"The last game of the season was a big learning point. Unfortunately, it was the last game of the season."

What Davis learned was to relax and run on his instincts once he got the ball. That was what had made him such a superb running back at Texas Christian.

But he was dismissed from the TCU team after the first game of his senior season because he had accepted payments from a booster.

Davis says he went into the NFL "knowing my ability, but I feel like the year I laid out hurt.

"I felt I had to prove something to someone," says the Packer halfback. "I was so intense and so caught up in that, that I really didn't perform in games."

Two plays earlier in that finale against the Giants, Davis carried the ball on a sweep to the left. Things went pretty smoothly until he encountered cornerback Elvis Patterson.

"I reversed my field too deep," Davis explains. "I looked at him. I should have gone past him as plain as day. All I had to do was run. I was trying to juke him.

"I was too tensed up."

After Patterson held him to a three-yard gain, Gregg spoke to Davis on the sidelines.

"He dropped both hands and said, 'Son, relax. Son, use your speed,' " Davis recalls. "That made me forget about all the bad things of the season. It made me relax.

"I felt incredibly good. I guess it was something I really needed. It really made me just get up and go play the game.

"The 50-yard play was the same play," Davis says. "I just reversed my field on it again. I saw it the same, but I broke earlier. My instincts sort of took over."

His instincts indicated to the Packers that he could be a consistent breakaway runner in the NFL. That was why they made him the 41st player selected in the 1986 draft.

As a junior at TCU, he rushed for 1,611 yards - with an average of 7.6 yards per carry - and 13 touchdowns. He was named offensive player of the year in the Southwest Conference, and he finished fifth in the Heisman Trophy balloting. In the 1985 season opener against Tulane, he ran for 152 yards in 24 carries.

"The biggest thing I learned was the intensity level."

Davis, who grew up in Temple, Texas, was nicknamed "The Temple Tornado" in college. But he didn't exactly take the NFL by storm. The 5-10, 212-pounder struggled during most of the Packers' 4-12 season.

"It was frustrating to me," he says.

He made his first start in the second game of the season, at New Orleans, and aggravated an ankle sprain he had suffered in the preseason.

In the third game, against Chicago, Davis suffered an abdominal injury that bothered him the rest of the season. It was diagnosed as a hernia, and in February he had surgery to repair it.

Davis started a total of six games. He wound up with 519 yards in 114 carries, a 4.6-yard average. That made him the leading rusher on a club that finished 23rd in the NFL in rushing. He also caught 21 passes for 142 yards and one TD.

Davis helped ignite a second-half comeback as the Packers beat the Browns, 17-14, in Cleveland. The Packers had lost their first six games of the season, and they appeared to be well on their way to 0-7 at halftime. They trailed, 14-3.

But Gregg put Davis in at halfback and Gerry Ellis at fullback to start the second half, and the offense began to roll.

Davis carried 10 times for 65 yards and caught a pass for seven. Ellis rushed for 16 yards and one TD in six carries and caught four passes for 65 yards.

Davis says that was his best game of the season.

"I only played in the second half, but I felt I performed pretty well," he says. "Gerry Ellis and I had talked before we went in there, and we were keyed up. We felt we could win that game. We got in the flow, and it felt pretty good.

"That was the first time I had an opportunity to get back in there and perform for a while, and it felt good," says Davis, who had carried only twice in each of the previous two games.

No Packer had a 100-yard rushing game last season, but Davis came the closest with 93 yards in 16 attempts in a 16-7 loss to Washington at Lambeau Field.

Davis, however, didn't have another big day until the Giant game. He carried eight times for 92 yards and caught six passes for 45. His only TD of the season came on a 15-yard pass from Wright that cut the deficit to 31-24.

"That was a big catch for me," Davis says. "I guess it was to show them, hey, Kenneth Davis is familiar with the offense and can catch the ball."

Davis had come from a veer offense at TCU and was not used much as a receiver. Earlier last season, Gregg had said Davis needed to improve his knowledge of the passing game.

"The New York Giant game showed them I was versatile and how I can be beneficial in many ways," Davis says. "I feel like with my ability it just wasn't right for me to be sitting on the sideline. Anytime I'm not playing and not playing up to the best of my ability, it's a low point for me."

But he concedes that his frequent absences from the lineup were "due to some of my performances.

"Some of that was due to my lack of familiarity with the passing game," he says. "I think that's something I've cleared up.

"I felt like I really didn't know my role. Some games, I felt like I was doing well. But I felt like I wasn't complete as a player."

Davis says his production last year was "nowhere near the type of performance I'm capable of providing.

"I don't think I truly proved anything last year - that I could go out on the field and perform," he says. "I've still got a long way to go. The only thing I need is an ample amount of playing time.

"I think this year is going to be more productive. It can't be anything but more productive, not only to me as a player but to us as a team.

"Now, I've come around, matured. I feel more comfortable going into this season. I think I really know more now about what my role is and what is expected of me.

"I think the biggest thing I learned (last year) was the intensity level, game after game.

"That's something I've learned to motivate myself to do.

"I feel I can make my passing game just as powerful as my running game.

"When my number's called, I feel like I can get the job done."

Davis says his biggest goal for this season is for the Packers to get into the playoffs and "have an excellent game." But he also wants to rush for 1,300 to 1,400 yards.

He isn't the only one looking for the Temple Tornado to be more of a force this year.

"He's going to be better," Gregg says. "He learned a great deal last year. He still has a lot to learn.

"He's a very talented young man and a willing worker. He wants to be good. He seems to be very durable.

"Just the fact that he's played a year in our system will be a plus for him. He's going to know more about the passing game, and he's going to be more comfortable with the system."

The Packers' top draft choice this year was halfback Brent Fullwood from Auburn. He and veteran Gary Ellerson should provide Davis with plenty of competition. But both Gregg and Willie Peete, the new offensive backfield coach, were impressed with Davis at the mini-camp in May. Peete said Davis did seem to be comfortable with the system.

Gregg says the Packers expect a lot more from Davis this year. Davis says, "I think Kenneth Davis will live up to all expectations."

'Lambeau' - Looking good at 30

Even under the lights, 'Lambeau' is impressive.

By BUD LEA
Milwaukee Sentinel

It is difficult to imagine very many 30-year-olds looking as good as Lambeau Field. After all, entertaining capacity crowds, year after year can make you old before your time.

But it would not be unfair to say this lovely lady is regarded as one of the best groomed of all football stadiums. She also has kept up with the times.

The city-owned stadium was dedicated in 1957 with a seating capacity of 32,150 and parking for 5,000 cars at a cost of $960,000. It has been expanded five times to bring its present capacity to 57,091 including 72 luxury boxes. That is only half of it.

Lambeau Field has one of the best playing fields in the National Football League. Its adjoining Administration Building and training facilities for the Packers take second to none.

This is an organization that takes pride in caring for its properties. They are constantly being maintained and improved.

There also is something about Lambeau Field that money can't buy. It is called tradition.

This is the home of the champions. This is the showplace where Vince Lombardi's Packers dominated the NFL, winning titles in 1961, 1962, 1965, 1966 and 1967.

This is where the famous "Ice Bowl" game was played on December 31, 1967, when the Packers and the Dallas Cowboys met for the NFL title. Lombardi had installed a new "electric blanket" heating system to neutralize the effects of Wisconsin's severe winters, but the temperature had plunged to 16 degrees below zero.

"The team that wins here" Lombardi had said, "won't win or lose because of the weather, but because it has the best team."

True to his word, the Packers defeated the Cowboys, 21-17.

This is where Don Chandler kicked a controversial, 27-yard field goal late in the fourth quarter to forge a tie and project the Packers' 1965 Western Conference playoff with the Baltimore Colts into overtime. Baltimore fans contend to this day that Chandler's kick was wide of its mark. Chandler later kicked an unchallenged 25-yarder at 13:39 of the overtime to give Green Bay the conference title (13-10) and send the Packers on their way to the first of three consecutive NFL championships - the only such parlay the league has seen since it went to the playoff system in 1933.

This is where the Packers overwhelmed the Cleveland Browns, 23-12, for the 1966 NFL title. Snow had turned the field into a quagmire, but it didn't bother Paul Hornung and Jim Taylor, who picked up 201 yards between them, while Cleveland's Jim Brown managed only 50 yards in 12 carries.

This is where the wildest, highest-scoring game in Monday Night Football history was played. The Packers and the Washington Redskins entertained a national television audience with 95 total points, with Green Bay coming out on top, 48-47, in 1983.

More recently, it also was the scene of the now celebrated "Snow Bowl" game of December 1, 1985, which saw 15 inches of snow, accompanied by winds gusting up to 35 miles an hour. One writer appropriately dubbed it a "meteorological mismatch" - because the visiting Tampa Bay Buccaneers obviously were out of their element. The Packers, accustomed to performing in the white stuff upon occasion, rolled up an incredible 512 yards of offense that Arctic afternoon and limited the hapless Bucs to a mere 65 yards in recording their first shutout victory (21-0) since 1977.

Thirty one years ago, it was entirely different. The Packers played in City Stadium, a rickety, old wooden structure that seated nearly 25,000 on the east side of town.

There were little, if any, toilet facilities, which made halftime an adventure for fans roaming under the stands. The home dressing room had two players to each locker, and an old bathtub with a pipe connected to it served as a whirlpool. The visiting team dressed in a downtown hotel.

"What really was bad about the old stadium was a white fence, hip high, that surrounded the playing field," said Gary Knafelc, a wide receiver with the Packers from 1954-62. "When a defender drove you out of bounds, you had to hurdle the fence or almost get killed.

"They also had fans sitting on folding chairs on the track behind the fence. And they were right on top of you, almost like sitting on our bench."

There were some advantages to this seating arrangement. When a Packer came up with a big play, he had his own cheering section.

"They got so carried away after I scored a touchdown in a game against Detroit, that they picked me up and carried me off the field," Knafelc said.

The press box facilities at the old stadium were deplorable. Former CBS network broadcaster Ray Scott recalled that, among other inadequacies, there was no place for announcers to set up at City Stadium when television made its appearance in 1956.

"We worked from within East High School, which was right next to the stands," Scott said.

Something had to be done if the Packers expected to stay in big-time sports in Green Bay. The Packers had moved into new County Stadium for the Milwaukee portion of their home schedule in 1953, and during the next three years Milwaukee games were outdrawing games in Green Bay.

Some opponents bluntly told the Packers to schedule their Green Bay games in Milwaukee so that they could take home a bigger share of the gate receipts. It was critical to the future of the franchise that Green Bay build a new stadium.

In the spring of '56, the citizens of Green Bay didn't hesitate to take action. They overwhelmingly approved a referendum to build a new City Stadium on the west side of town. The Packers offered to pay at least half the interest and principal on the proposed stadium through a 20-year lease at $30,000 a year.

The new stadium was dedicated September 24, 1957 before a sellout crowd of 32,150 and such distinguished witnesses as Vice President Nixon, NFL Commissioner Bert Bell, Chicago Bears owner George Halas, and to add glamour to the event, Miss America, Marilyn VanDerbur of Denver.

"We finally were big time," Knafelc said about moving into the new stadium. "It was fantastic. Everyone had their own locker."

It was only fitting that the Packers kicked off their 39th season in their brand new stadium against their oldest rivals, the Chicago Bears. Liz Blackbourn's Packers were coming off a 4-8 season, and the Bears had captured the NFL's Western Conference with a 9-2-1 record in '56.

"We grew up together in the NFL," Halas told the capacity crowd during the halftime ceremonies. "The Bears congratulate you."

The Packers then showed the Bears how much they appreciated them. With less than nine minutes left in the game, Babe Parilli threw a six-yard touchdown pass to Knafelc to give the Packers a 21-17 victory over the Bears. That was the Packers' only victory in their new home in 1957.

But this all changed with Lombardi's arrival in '59. Until the Lombardi era, the Packers had never played a championship game in Green Bay.

In 1939, the Packers won the Western Conference title and met the New York Giants for the NFL championship. After some consideration, Curly Lambeau moved the playoff game from Green Bay to Milwaukee. A State Fair Park crowd of 32,279 watched the Packers pound the Giants, 27-0.

In 1961, the Packers met the Giants again in the first title game ever played in Green Bay. A capacity crowd of 39,029 watched the Packers clobber the Giants, 37-0.

The new, animated scoreboard, a $ 1,000,000 project, made its debut in 1986.

Lambeau had founded the Packers in 1919. He had coached the team for 31 years, posted a winning percentage of .639 and three straight NFL titles (1929, 1930, 1931), as well as subsequent championships in 1936, '39 and '44.

When Lambeau died June 1, 1965, there was considerable sentiment for changing the name of City Stadium to Lambeau Field in honor of the team's founder and first coach.

"Curly's sister circulated petitions around town asking for the change 'because the new stadium had not been named after one of the greatest coaches of all time," said Judge Clarence Nier, former Green Bay city attorney. "After one of our meetings, we stopped in a place for a little libation, and who was in there but Curly Lambeau.

"Curly said he didn't give a damn if anybody named anything after him. He told us not to bother. It would have been almost criminal not to rename the stadium in his honor."

"A committee was named to make a report to the Stadium Commission and the Green Bay city council as far as renaming it. None of them were going to rename it after Lambeau, but rather for Lombardi.

"That's what everyone said until after we met. All that they said previously about renaming it for Lombardi went down the drain. The followers of Curly's sister did their job, and that's how it happened," Nier said.

"Lombardi strenuously opposed it. He felt the stadium should be called Green Bay City Stadium. He reasoned, for purposes of national television, announcers would just call it Lambeau Field and Green Bay wouldn't be mentioned."

Lombardi, of course, had some personal reasons. He surely must have hoped it would be named after him one day. Instead, the street in front of Lambeau Field was renamed Lombardi Avenue.

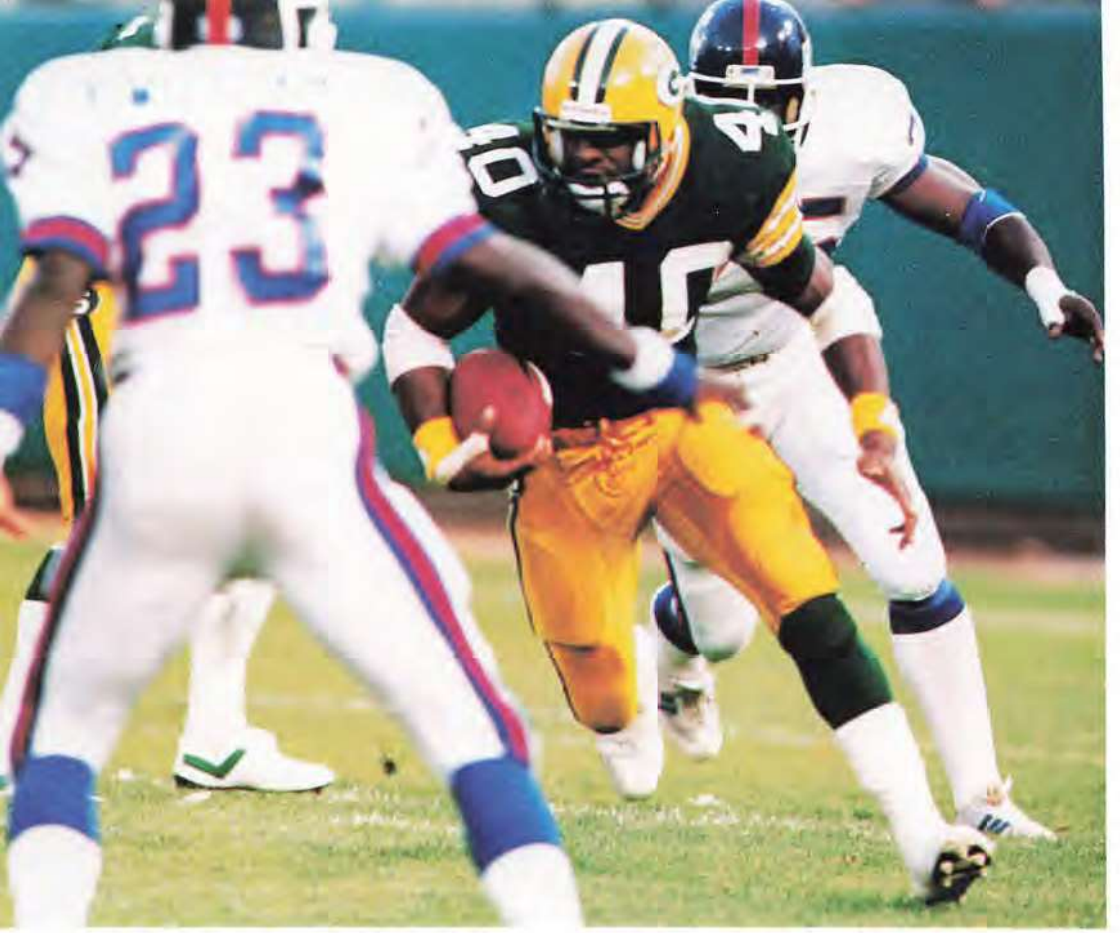
Lambeau Field is owned by the City of Green Bay. The Packers, however, have made and paid for all of the improvements - administration building, private boxes, concession stands, rest rooms, scoreboard, press box. The addition of the luxury boxes cost $4.5 million when completed in 1985.

A new sound system is planned for this season. There are no plans for a dome.

"It's been discussed for a long time," said Bob Harlan, assistant to the president. "It could still be done, even with the private boxes. But we have found it difficult to believe with just six dates a year a dome would be the answer."

Don't count a dome out. Even Lombardi talked about putting a top on the stadium. He had his own plan, with a covering that could be opened and closed.

Whatever happens, the next 30 years at Lambeau should be as exciting as the first 30.



Eddie Lee Ivery is captured in his most familiar role.

Eddie Lee

A versatile warrior

By SHARON RABOIN
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Tom Coughlin, the passing game/receivers coach of the Green Bay Packers, was asked how Eddie Lee Ivery was able to make such a smooth transition last season from running back to wide receiver and special teams.

Without hesitation, Coughlin said: "Because he is a football player."

Those words were spoken with utmost respect.

Because he is a football-smart player who understands the game and seldom makes unforced mistakes, the Packers felt comfortable enough to switch Ivery after he had spent seven seasons carrying the football.

And because he is a highly-competitive player with loads of heart and determination, Ivery not only adjusted to the new positions but excelled in them.

Missing the first four games with a neck injury, Ivery came back to catch 31 passes for 385 yards and one touchdown and lead the special teams in tackles with 14 and four assists. He was the team's fourth-leading receiver, behind James Lofton, Phillip Epps and Walter Stanley.

"Whatever position that Coach (Forrest) Gregg asks me to play, he knows that he is going to get a 100-percent effort," said Ivery. " ... I just can't do nothing half speed."

After practice one day last season, Ivery said that he approached Gregg. Gary Ellerson and Kenneth Davis were struggling at running back and Ivery wanted Gregg to know that he was willing to switch back to his old position if it would help the team.

Gregg's response? Well, Ivery remained at wide receiver. But Ivery said that Gregg told him: "I know you're ready because you're a warrior."

A "football player" and a "warrior."

Apt descriptions. Few players have the mettle or the ability to make a transition such as Ivery did. Few could overcome two major knee surgeries in three seasons - to the same knee no less. Injuries that many observers feel robbed Ivery of some of his quickness and speed. And few could keep their heads up after a couple of potentially damaging off-the-field incidents.

But Ivery has done all of that. He is what you would call a survivor.

"One thing about Eddie Lee Ivery," Ivery said, pausing momentarily, "he's not a quitter."

The longevity of most players in the National Football League is about three seasons. This will be the ninth one for Ivery, who is from Thomson, Georgia, and starred in college football at Georgia Tech.

"He's very sharp," Coughlin said. "Asks a lot of questions. Studies. Thinks. Just has a real good feel for the game."

Which enabled the Packers, with somewhat of a surplus at running back, to try Ivery at wide receiver. His first day of running patterns and catching passes with Lofton and Stanley and the rest of the wideouts was August 18, after the team's second exhibition game.

"It was a decision made in preseason because he was an excellent receiver coming out of the backfield," Coughlin said. " ... And because we felt we had some strength in a couple of young running backs and wanted to give them a great amount of time to develop themselves."

The Packers believed, Coughlin said, that Ivery would complement the existing receiving corps. Lofton and Epps had the speed to get deep, whereas Ivery was more of a possession-type receiver.

Ivery is thought to have good hands and statistics bear that out. After last season, he moved into 11th place on the team's all-time receiving list with 162 catches for 1,612 yards.

Generally, last season Ivery entered games in passing situations, second and long or third and long. He would set up in the backfield, with Lofton, Epps and Stanley at the line of scrimmage. Ivery started the last game of the season when Lofton was suspended.

"His unique abilities to not only pass protect as a running back but to come out of the backfield as a receiver allowed us to play, in a sense, our four best receivers at one time," Coughlin said.

The Packers traded Lofton to the Los Angeles Raiders in the off-season. But that isn't expected to affect Ivery's role as a possession-type receiver.

Ivery still remembers the day that he was instructed to join Coughlin and the receivers. He said he went over to the new group, unaware of what was in store for him.

And when he found out? "My initial reaction was to do whatever I could for our football team," Ivery said.

C'mon, Eddie Lee.

Ivery thought for a moment. "Anytime you've been playing running back all your life, and then all of a sudden a change comes, it takes time to adjust," he said.

"It was a funny feeling at first," he added. "When they get to moving you around, maybe they don't have a place for you."

Most likely a natural feeling. After all, Ivery was a seasoned veteran. The year before he had led the Packers in rushing with 636 yards on 132 carries, a 4.8 average. And he was the team's eighth-leading rusher of all time with 2,908 yards.

But Ivery took it all in stride. He didn't grumble about moving over to wide receiver or scoff at playing on the special teams. Not Eddie Lee Ivery.

That's not his nature. Although he said that he still considered himself a great running back, he had no choice but to switch positions. Ivery knew that he wanted to contribute to the team. And he knew that he still had the talent and the desire to do so.

So instead of sulking, Ivery looked at the new positions as a challenge, as a chance to prove once again his immense talents.

"I got there and concentrated on what I was doing," Ivery said. "I surprised myself and I'm sure I surprised the coaches."

A surprise? No, said Coughlin. The Packers had confidence in Ivery, otherwise they wouldn't have moved him. But, Coughlin said, Ivery performed "much better than we may have given him credit for initially."

Ivery put his mind to learning all that he could about the position. How to attack a man-to-man defense and how to find seams in a zone. How to break free from the bump and run and how to adjust routes upfield in the middle of a play.

"Being the great teacher that (Coughlin) is, I got all the techniques down," Ivery said.

Ivery even learned how to pull in a pass over the middle and not let go of it after a bone-rattling hit. The secret, Ivery said, is total concentration.

He said that he took a good shot in a game against the Pittsburgh Steelers.

"I caught the ball and I was hit low and I was hit high at the same time," Ivery said. "And that's the closest thing to death that I've ever seen. But I held onto the football."

He was hurting, he said. But he picked himself up and a couple of plays later went back into the game. He said that he wasn't about to let the defensive backs know that he was hurting.

Ivery said that the switch in positions wasn't an extremely difficult one. Both of them, running back and wide receiver, are in the same family, he said. A running back must be able to catch the football and a receiver must be able to run after he catches it.

If he surprised some people with his performance at wide receiver, Ivery probably surprised even more with what he did on special teams.

Eddie Lee, pursued by Tampa Bay's Scott Brantley, displays his receiving talents.

He said that he played linebacker in high school and understood the mechanics of tackling. A member of both the kickoff and punt coverage teams, Ivery said that his goal was to contribute. Each time out he wanted to be the player making the tackle.

To do that, Ivery needed to get past the blocker standing in front of him.

"I say to myself, 'I'm a better one-on-one player than the one I'm up against.' That's what I tell myself. Sometimes I'm not," he said with a laugh. "But I have to convince myself to believe in that."

Special teams wasn't all bad, he said. There was something to be said for running downfield and sticking the ballcarrier.

"I had the opportunity to initiate some of the punishment I had gotten for eight years," Ivery said.

What struck Coughlin was Ivery's upbeat attitude about playing on special teams, where rookies greatly outnumber the veterans.

"In this day and age, you know you run into some of these people that are stars or former stars and they want to know why they're being asked to play on special teams," Coughlin said. "This guy just comes to play. Whatever you ask him to do, he just does it with a great attitude, an infectious attitude."

After a season at wide receiver and an off-season of hard workouts, Ivery said that he is looking forward to this year.

"I've got some experience under my belt," Ivery said. "It makes me feel like a second-year man."

DR. 'B'

By TOM MURPHY
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Dr. E. S. Brusky, Packer Team Physician, ministers to Mike Moffitt on the sidelines.

When Vince Lombardi wanted something he got it. Seldom was it necessary to ask twice.

It was spring 1962; the infant years of the Green Bay Packers teams that Lombardi soon would forge with iron will and steel drive into one of the most successful and memorable dynasties in National Football League history.

"I need a doctor," legend has Lombardi telling a physician-playing partner at Oneida Golf & Riding Club in Green Bay.

"I've just got to do something about the ordinary problems players have," Lombardi told the late Dr. Mason LeTellier.

"I'm getting one opinion from this doctor and another from that one. There's no coordination," the coach said. "Almost every player's going to his own doctor. I can't tell who's ready when," the story goes.

Lombardi detested disarray.

LeTellier was one of the club's better players and the reason why Lombardi often played with him. Lombardi, if nothing else, was a golf nut. But he was just as shrewd on the links as on the turf. He knew how to pick winners in both games.

"You play a lot with just the right man," LeTellier told Lombardi. "Gene Brusky."

General practitioner Dr. Eugene Brusky jumped at Lombardi's invitation and thus began a career now in its 26th year.

Brusky admitted the job ("the realization of a lifetime dream") forced him to curtail golf, his favorite participant sport.

But he's played enough and hits the ball far enough to drive the green on Oneida's 373-yard par 4 sixth hole. And he's accurate enough to have a hole-in-one on the 220-yard, par 3 17th hole.

On that par 4 drive, "It was before they were watering (the fairways). The ball hit short of the creek (about 20 yards in front of the green) and bounced over. It was fun."

He's also won a Wisconsin pro-am driving contest hitting the green on a 325-yard hole in competition against the likes of professionals Bobby Brue, who is on the Senior PGA tour, and Manuel De la Torre.

Brusky, now 65, played only sandlot football while growing up in a crossroads farm community west of Green Bay.

There were nine boys (and four girls) in the Brusky family. They didn't need many neighbors to field two teams.

"We'd be down there at the school on Sundays, overalls and work shoes, going at it. But we always quit in time to get home and listen to Russ Winnie broadcast the Packer games."

Arnie Herber, Don Hutson, of course, Milt Gantenbein, Bobby Monnett, Hank Bruder, Mike Michalske, Joe Laws and on down the list of stars of the 1936, 1939 and 1944 championship teams, the last Packer dynasty before Lombardi's arrival.

Serious football never figured in Brusky's plans, however.

"My Dad hid the football all the time. He figured, one, you could get hurt which was expensive in Depression days and, two, if you were hurt, you couldn't do your chores."

As the youngest of 13 Bruskys, his primary chore was milking cows, Brusky said.

"Too, my Dad was a practical man. He wanted all his kids to get an education.

"He figured if he sent Alvin and Ziggy to medical school, they could eventually help Sam and I get through. They did, too."

Dr. Alvin Brusky retired a couple of years ago after a career in general practice in Green Bay. Dr. Zigmund Brusky still practices dentistry a couple of days a week in Pulaski, a hamlet northwest of Green Bay. Samuel Brusky died in a car-truck accident in 1966 while on a house call north of town.

Several nephews carry on the Brusky medical tradition but none of Gene and Hazel Brusky's 14 children followed their father's footsteps.

"I think it's because they saw that I was seldom home for supper, was gone a lot of nights, because when they were young, we still were making a lot of house calls.

"You really weren't able to do what you wanted to do when you wanted to do it," Brusky said.

Since 1962, however, Brusky said he's doing just what he's wanted to do: playing an integral role in one of only 28 professional football franchises.

"We did it for expenses only and I loved it," he said. The first person plural was a reference to orthopedist James Nellen, his predecessor and mentor. "Gradually, though, we worked out compensation and there never were any problems."

Brusky credits Nellen, a former University of Wisconsin football player, with teaching him how to handle injuries (and egos) common to athletes but perhaps not often seen in a general practice.

Shortly after he joined Nellen on the team, Packer linebacker Nelson Toburen ended his football career when he tackled Baltimore's Johnny Unitas and suffered a severe neck injury.

"They had to pry Jim's hands from Nelson's neck. He immobilized it all the way to the dressing room and all the way to the hospital. Nelson's OK today, thanks to Jim."

The Toburen memory popped up in the Packer-Bear game in Lambeau Field last year. Tim Lewis' promising career as a cornerback ended when he buried his head tackling a receiver.

"It was serious, but not like Toburen's. The paralysis factor wasn't there with Tim."

The emphasis on off-season conditioning and year-round weight work leads Brusky to believe today's players are in better condition than Paul Hornung or Max McGee or, perhaps even Jimmy Taylor, the fullback who prided himself on staying in shape.

"Can you see Paul or Max in a weight room in Green Bay in February or March?"

But Brusky is just as aware of the dark side in many of today's athletes.

There is a school of thought that some players spend too much time in weight rooms and it gets to the point where muscles put undue strain on tendons and ligaments.

Brusky doesn't necessarily subscribe to those thoughts.

"I don't think players, with correct programs, can overdo workouts or training," he said.

Brusky mentions Packer John Anderson, the linebacker who broke his left arm three times in each of his first three seasons.

Each time Brusky and veteran Packer Trainer Domenic Gentile were among the first to attend to Anderson.

"There's a guy who plays the game because he likes it," Brusky said. He wouldn't go so far as to call Anderson a throwback to the pioneer days of Bill Hewitt of the Giants who liked to play without a helmet.

Brusky did allow as how "Anderson keeps himself pretty well-conditioned the year round. Plus, he's a good rugged ballplayer."

The doctor put offensive tackle Karl Swanke in the same class. Swanke has come back from three left knee operations and "it's the dedication that does it for guys like Anderson and Swanke."

" 'Dr. B' has a great rapport with players and their families," said Gentile who has been taping and splinting and otherwise caring for Packer players for 27 years. He has been the teams' chief trainer since 1970.

"He tends to underestimate his ability," Gentile said. "He's a GP (general practitioner), yes, but he's got 26 years of sports medicine experience and to me that qualifies him as a sports medicine specialist."

Brusky, too, keeps himself in good condition. At 6-foot even and about 195 pounds with a minimum of excess weight, the doctor could pass muster in a uniform, until the National Anthem, at least, when the helmet had to come off and the gray hair gave him away.

Brusky is resilient.

Dr. 'B' has a great rapport with players and their families.

Packers Set Record By Air

As every good Packerphile well knows, 1986 was not a vintage year for Green Bay's National Football League representatives. Despite the 4-and-12 record, however, they made team statistical history in two major categories.

With Randy Wright coming into his own as a starting quarterback and precision marksman, they set a club record for most passes attempted in a season, 565, and amassed 3,447 net yards passing - the second highest total in club records, which date back 52 years to 1935.

The old record for passing attempts, 526, was set in 1983. And only in that year, when the Packers gained "extra" opportunities via a record five overtime games, has Green Bay been more productive through the air. They rolled up 4,365 passing yards in '83 en route to setting an all-time team record for total yardage with 6,172.

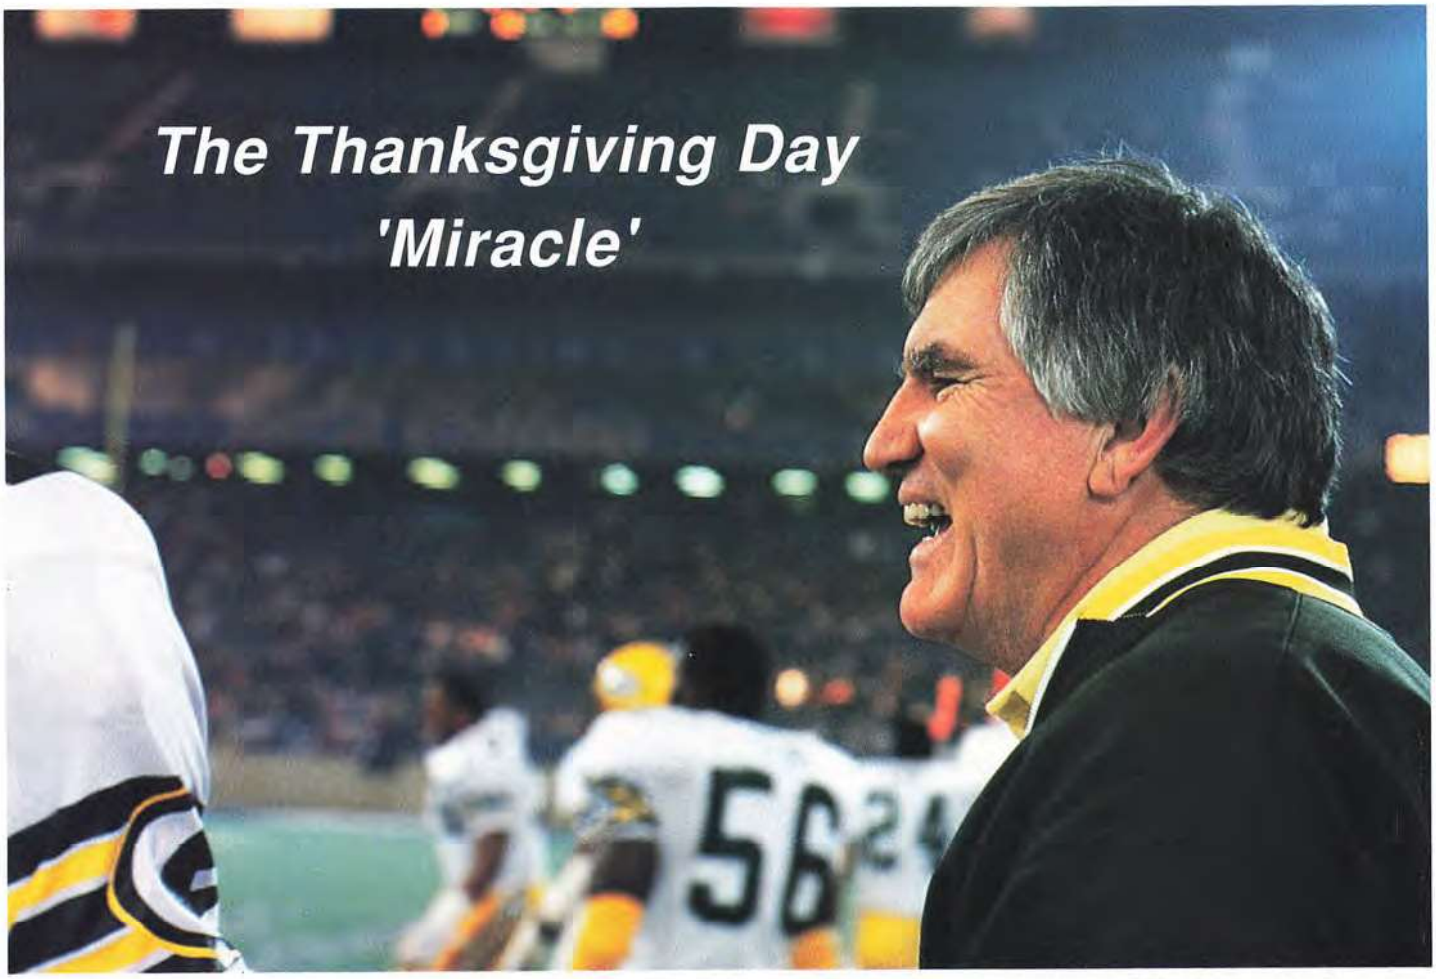
The Thanksgiving Day 'Miracle'



Coach Forrest Gregg exults in dramatic holiday triumph.

By DON LANGENKAMP
Green Bay Press-Gazette

Even in today's world of exhaustive sports statistics, it is not known exactly how many Green Bay Packer fans set down their drumsticks and bolted from their Thanksgiving Day tables back to their television sets on November 27, 1986.

Certainly there were many across Wisconsin who had succumbed to tantalizing odors from the kitchen when the Packers fell behind the Detroit Lions 40-30 midway through the fourth quarter of the nationally televised game in the Pontiac Silverdome.

And only the staunchest fans endured their growling stomachs to watch the last 62 seconds, even though the Packers had at least made it interesting by pulling within three points of the Lions at 40-37.

It had, after all, been an entertaining game between two teams mired in losing seasons. The Packers and Lions slugged away at each other the entire game, as 77 points in the first 59 minutes of play indicated.

But it wasn't over, not by a long shot. Wiry, lightning-quick Walter Stanley, who had already had a career day, saved his ultimate effort until the end. Stanley, with one final dramatic bolt for the end zone made everyone, at least temporarily, forget what he had already accomplished this holiday afternoon.

With one minute, two seconds left, the Lions' Jim Arnold was back to punt, warily watching the 10 Packers on the line of scrimmage hell bent on blocking the kick. It seemed their only chance. Linebacker Tim Harris, who had an outstanding game, had already blocked one Detroit punt. Could he, or a teammate, duplicate the feat?

It didn't work out that way, but it didn't have to. Arnold got away a good kick; better than good, actually. It traveled 46 yards and it was majestically high in trajectory. It was a robust punt with character, not a line drive tailor-made for a long return.

But Stanley settled under the ball and had one luxury: Detroit's pursuit was still 10 yards away when he gathered it in, because of the Lion's preoccupation with preventing a blocked kick.

It was all the quicksilver return man needed. Stanley had been told to call for a fair catch, but he quickly scratched that plan. He wheeled to his right, but quickly pivoted, reversed his field and found himself blessed with a wall of white shirted blockers.

Eighty-three yards. Touchdown! Hysteria on the Packers' bench, to be repeated later in the Green Bay locker room. Packers win 44-40, after an aroused defense thwarted any potential last-second Detroit dramatics.

Yes, it was memorably dramatic, this Thanksgiving Day game. But if the game is remembered as a showcase of Walter Stanley's talents and nothing else, it would be a miscarriage of justice.

The Packers on Thanksgiving Day were a team confronted with a mountain of adversity. Just four days earlier, nose tackle Charles Martin had executed his infamous body slam of Chicago Bears' quarterback Jim McMahon. It was an act that sent shockwaves through the National Football League. The ensuing coast-to-coast outcry against Martin's action was impossible for the Packer players to ignore. Martin, the defense and Coach Forrest Gregg were being examined and dissected and criticized by virtually every major media outlet in the country.

All this negative attention didn't exactly create an atmosphere conducive to winning. Rampant distractions. A short week. Wide receiver Phillip Epps lost with a broken leg suffered in the Bears game. A team coming off an emotional, crushing, close loss to the defending world champions.

Add it all up and it seemed that the Packers had too many elements working against them to regroup for a solid effort against Detroit.

Gregg knew his young team was at an emotional crossroads. It could easily go one of two ways, either disintegrate into a state of disarray or come together in a garrison-mentality bond of unified purpose.

Gregg himself had to deal with more distractions than anyone else. From Sunday afternoon until Thanksgiving Day, Gregg spent much of his time answering questions and charges directed at him from the media and various members of the Chicago Bears organization, most notably Coach Mike Ditka.

Publicly, it seemed that Gregg and his players were advancing toward the Lions game looking back at the Bears game. There was little talk of the meeting in the Silverdome; there was endless dialogue on what had happened the Sunday before.

That was the public posture. It was defensive and sometimes combative. It was entirely natural for Gregg to strive to protect the reputations of his players and himself. But the precious time spent doing that would seemingly erode the team's preparations for the game ahead.

But in team meetings, in practice sessions, in one-on-one conversations with players, Gregg must have taken a sensitive, confidence-building approach. Perhaps he twisted adversity into an advantageous psychological tool. But whatever he did, he had his team emotionally ready to play the following Thursday.

After Stanley's last gasp dash won it for the Packers, Gregg met the press with a Texas-sized smile and pronounced, "Now I can smile again." But it was far more than Stanley's heroics throughout the game that lightened Gregg's features.

There was quarterback Randy Wright, playing on a bad knee that had kept him out of practice all week. He completed 18 of 26 passes for 286 yards. More significantly, he threw three touchdown passes, two to Stanley, and misfired only once for an interception.

There were running backs Gerry Ellis and Paul Ott Carruth. Gregg's younger backs, 23-year-old Gary Ellerson and 24-year-old Kenneth Davis, had struggled in recent outings. True, they represented the Packers' future. But Gregg decided to try the more seasoned duo of Ellis and Carruth and it paid off.

Ellis, getting his first starting assignment of the season, rushed for 56 yards in 13 carries and caught three passes for 20 yards. Carruth ran seven times for 45 yards and a healthy 6.4 average and caught two passes for 17 yards. Together they combined to take some of the pressure off the passing game and allow Wright and Stanley to weave their magic.

Disregard, for a moment, Stanley's game-winning stunner and feast on his other Thanksgiving Day accomplishments. Even without the punt Stanley made a gigantic offensive impact. He caught four passes for 124 yards.

An exultant Stanley would say later he dedicated the game to the injured Epps, the man he replaced in the starting lineup. "I promised him before I left I'd get one for him," he said. "That's what I was going for."

Not one, but three. And they all were necessary for the win.

The Packers' defense was not consistent, but it was occasionally spectacular. Linebacker Tim Harris, in particular, came up with one of those defensive plays that seems to ignite a team on both sides of the ball.

With Green Bay trailing 10-3 in the first quarter, Harris burst through and blocked Arnold's punt on the 10-yard line. John Simmons fell on the ball just before it escaped the end zone. In general, Harris was all over the field, and his play prompted CBS sportscaster, John Madden, to name him to his "all holiday team."

But to break this game down into unit performances would be wrong. If there was one outstanding characteristic about this victory, it was not offense or defense or special teams. It was an undercurrent of can do, charged emotion by a group of beleaguered football players and their coaching staff.

That was no better exemplified than when Green Bay trailed 37-23 late in the third quarter. Wright to Stanley, 36 yards, touchdown. Then, after Detroit drove to Green Bay's four and came away with just a field goal, the Wright-to-Stanley combination clicked for 62 yards and Carruth subsequently ran it in for a touchdown.

Then, of course, Stanley ultimately took matters into his own hands and won the game.

The post-game exuberance was unrivaled in the 1986 season. Players seemed reluctant to let go of the emotional win. Instead, they relived it in groups of three, four or five and the team embroiled in a national incident just days before became a team awash with success.

"We didn't give up," seemed to be the spoken and unspoken battle cry. "We could have caved in, but we didn't."

Packers' President Robert Parins seasoned the celebration with $50 Thanksgiving Day dinner bonuses all around. But the real spice for this young team was the show it had just put on in front of a national television audience.

It was an eloquent statement of moxie, delivered with a flourish. And it provided a welcome interruption to thousands of Wisconsin Thanksgiving Day dinners.

James Lofton jumps for joy after making record 489th reception.

Lofton passes Hutson

Harry Truman had been President less than a year when Don Hutson closed out an incomparable career in December of 1945 with 488 pass receptions - a Packer record.

It was to stand unchallenged for more than 40 years - a veritable eternity in professional sports - surviving assaults by such talented receivers as Boyd Dowler, who made 449 catches during an 11-year career (1959-69) and Max McGee, who finished a 12-year Packer tour of duty in 1967 with 345.

The record's long reign came to an end, however, in 1986 - on the murky, overcast afternoon of October 5 in Milwaukee County Stadium, where the Packers were entertaining the Bengals.

James Lofton, who had entered the season only 22 catches shy of the hallowed mark, gathered in a 15-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Randy Wright in the heart of the Cincinnati end zone with 7:04 remaining in the fourth quarter to eclipse Hutson's 41-year-old standard. It was, at that point, the 489th reception of Lofton's nine-year, 126-game career.

The fabled Hutson, now a year-round resident of Rancho Mirage, California, had set the record in 11 seasons and 117 games from 1935 through 1945.

Usually nonchalant, Lofton raised his arms in triumph as soon as the record catch was made. "I was really excited," he admitted following the game. "The record is important to me. They've had some great players here (in Green Bay) and some great receivers. Don Hutson was one of the premier receivers. If he had played as many games as I have, he probably would have put the record out of sight.

"When you look at all the guys around the league who are setting records - Charlie Joiner and Steve Largent, for example - we're just guys who are falling in line ... Hutson was the original, he was the first. Everybody is still going to be second to him."

He added with quiet pride, however, "It's great to be a record-holder for such a prominent franchise, a franchise that has been around for a long time ... It's a great honor."

Lofton caught one more pass before the afternoon was over, closing out the day with 7 catches for 109 yards and the 32nd 100-yard receiving day of his pro career - also a Packer record.

Three weeks later - against the Steelers at Pittsburgh - the former Stanford track All-American became only the 15th player in National Football League history to catch 500 passes in a career. By season's end he had swelled that total to 530, the Packers' new lifetime mark.

Lofton, subsequently traded to the Los Angeles Raiders on April 13 of this year, owns two other Packer career and single season records - for most receiving yards, career, 9,656, and most receiving yards, season, 1,361 (in 1984).

Can The Bears Be Dethroned?

Can the Bears be dethroned?

This is the question before the rest of the National Football Conference's Central Division house going into the 1987 season.

It finds the Monsters of the Midway, Super Bowl champions two years ago, in pursuit of a fourth straight division title.

Not since the Minnesota Vikings held sway in the 1970's, winning six consecutive division championships (1973-78) has one team enjoyed such extended dominance in the Central Division.

The Bears have won 29 of 32 games over the past two seasons, posting a 15-1 record in 1985 and a 14-2 mark last season.

Overall, however, the Minnesota Vikings remain the most successful team in the history of the Central Division, which was formed in 1967 with the Packers, Detroit Lions, Bears and Vikings as charter members. Tampa Bay became the fifth entry in the Central Division in 1977.

The Vikings, 7-9 and runnersup to the Bears in the Division race a year ago, own the only all-time winning record in the CD. They have a 20-year record of 170 wins, 118 losses and 5 ties. The Bears are next up with 139-151-2, followed by the Lions with 130-152-9, the Packers with 126-156-9 and the Buccaneers with 46-90-1.

AFC Divisional Playoffs (CBS and NBC); Sunday, Jan. 10-NFC and AFC Divisional Playoffs (CBS and NBC); at Jack Murphy Stadium, San Diego, California (ABC); NBC-AFC Pro Bowl, Honolulu, Hawaii (ESPN).

John Elway, Denver's Super Bowl Quarterback, will face the Packers in Arizona and Milwaukee.

Packers 'Debut' in Arizona

For the second year in a row, the Packers are opening a new "frontier," so to speak.

A year ago, they made franchise history by playing in the University of Wisconsin's Camp Randall Stadium at Madison for the first time.

Initially an experiment, it proved to be a resounding success. The Packers' baptismal Madison appearance drew a near capacity house of 73,959 fans - the largest crowd ever to see them play on Wisconsin soil. It also was the second-largest gathering of the National Football League's 1986 pre-season, ranking behind only the 80,000-plus turnout for the "American Bowl" game between the Chicago Bears and Dallas Cowboys in London, England.

The Packers made it a happy day all around at Camp Randall - for all but the visiting Jets - rolling to a 38-14 victory.

This year, they are venturing much farther afield to record another "first." It finds them making their first appearance ever in the state of Arizona, taking on Super Bowl XXI finalist Denver quarterback John Elway in Sun Devil Stadium at Tempe, Arizona, Saturday night, August 15.

Poetically enough, the contest is sponsored by NFL Expansion, Inc., a Phoenix group which is headed by former Packer quarterback and head coach Bart Starr. Starr's group is seeking an NFL franchise and is hopeful that the Packer-Bronco matchup - and its reception by Phoenix fans - will enhance its chances of success.

A week later, the Packers will pay a second visit to Madison - one which promises to lure another huge crowd to Camp Randall - this time to face the Washington Redskins and Jay Schroeder, the Milwaukee native who has become one of the NFL's premier quarterbacks.

The Packers will encounter two other talented young field generals, Boomer Esiason and Bernie Kosar, in their remaining pre-season outings - against Esiason's Cincinnati Bengals in the 27th Bishop's Charities Game in Green Bay Saturday night, August 29, and against Kosar's Cleveland Browns in the 38th Midwest Shrine Game at Milwaukee County Stadium Saturday night, September 5.

All but the Bengals among those four pre-season foes qualified for the playoffs in 1986 and the Broncos went all the way to the Super Bowl - in fact, led the eventual champion New York Giants at halftime in SB XXI - which suggests they will afford the Packers ample opportunity to hone their talents for the demanding, regular season schedule ahead.

The latter, incidentally, has been rated the NFL's fourth toughest, based on the composite, 1986 won-lost records of opponents.

It begins with a formidable assignment against the Los Angeles Raiders, who visit Green Bay's Lambeau Field Sunday, September 13, to help the Packers launch their 67th National Football League season.

It will be followed by another major test against the Broncos, in Milwaukee County Stadium one week later - Sunday, September 20, which will find the Coloradans making their first Milwaukee appearance since 1971 and playing a regular season game in Wisconsin for only the second time.

Then will come a critical seven-week stretch, one which will find the Packers playing six of their eight Central Division games, including home-and-home showdowns with both the Chicago Bears and Detroit Lions in this span.

This imposing agenda begins with a pair of road trips - to Tampa September 27, and to Minnesota October 3, followed by a home date against the Lions October 11.

The Packers next will take a break from their Central Division exertions to host the Philadelphia Eagles October 18 before playing three more division rivals in succession - the Lions at the Pontiac Silverdome October 25, the Buccaneers at Milwaukee November 1 and the Bears in Lambeau Field's friendly confines November 8.

Three consecutive road contests will follow - at Seattle November 15, in a game which will find the Packers making their first regular season appearance ever in the Kingdome; at Kansas City November 22, a city the green and gold will be visiting for the first time since 1977; and at Chicago November 29 for a rematch with the Bears.

They then close out their home schedule against the 49ers December 6 (at 'Lambeau') and against the Vikings at Milwaukee December 13 before wrapping up their challenging, 16-game program on the road in a nationally televised match with the Super Bowl champion Giants Saturday afternoon, December 19 and a post-Christmas finale against the Saints in the New Orleans Superdome December 27.
